TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

—o—

FEW words are required to introduce to the reader the learned author of the present work, as he is already known to English theologians by his Commentaries on Judges and Ruth in Lange's Bibelwerk. In Germany the author deservedly enjoys a wide reputation, for his books on religious, social, and scientific subjects are indeed legion, and his ministerial and philanthropic activity is appreciated by all classes, from the emperor to the poorest labouring man. This volume will supply a want long felt, for it elucidates the book of Esther in such a vivid and graphic manner as to make the reader realize the wonderful dealings of God with His chosen and thrice-redeemed people. Herodotus, the Talmud, the Midrashim, and other ancient books, as well as modern discoveries, reports of travellers concerning Persian customs and manners, and philological science, have been brought to bear their respective testimonies to the truth of the recorded events. To this book are applicable, to a large extent, the weighty words of the Ven. Archdeacon Farrar in the Expositor of January 1888, where he says, "When we study a great modern commentary we are indeed heirs of all the ages." And again: "Philology, which is a science still in its infancy, has aided and enriched our modern scholarship." The author has happily combined the topical, exegetical, critical, and the practical methods of exposition, and has offered us instructive and interesting matter on every incident touched upon in the sacred narrative. It is a bona fide historical commentary, and its parallels are striking, giving us an insight into ancient Oriental life, and especially Persian, as no other book of a similar kind does.

It is also valuable on account of its apologetical character. The author holds a brief, and as a zealous advocate he pleads Israel's cause before the nations, asks for tolerance and large-hearted charity towards them, shows the injustice of the repeated Haman-like attacks to which they have in the course of their checkered history been subjected, and the wonderful intervention of Providence in their behalf, as well as the punishments which their covenant God meted out to their enemies. In a word, he, like Mordecai, "speaks peace to all his seed," and, more than Mordecai, preaches "peace on earth and good-will towards men." The four Appendices will be found exceedingly interesting and instructive, especially to Biblical students. That of the First Targum will appear for the first time in English. The author used the Amsterdam edition, and amended the text by the light of the Second Targum, Fürth 1768, ספר מגלה אסתר, ed. 1698, and the Hebrew version of Mordechai Ventura, Amsterdam 1870, and also the translation of Fürstenthal. The Targum is divided into eleven paragraphs as follows:—

- § 1. Introduction about Ahhashverosh.
- § 2. The acrostic concerning Solomon.
- § 3. The description of Solomon's throne.
- § 4. Solomon and the Queen of Sheba.
- § 5. The legend about Jeremiah.
- § 6. The dialogue of Vashti and her death.
- § 7. The election of Esther as queen.
- § 8. The accusation of Haman.

- § 9. The penitence of Mordecai, Esther, and the people.
- § 10. The fall of Haman.
- § 11. The great deliverance of the Jews.

The author's notes, besides containing a mine of rich material, throw light on every point. By explaining the names of the ancestors of Haman, he indicates the time when the Targum was written, when the Jews were oppressed by the Romans in the time of Justinian. Such names as Pilate the governor, Felix the vicious brother of Pallas, Florus, Cuspius Fadus, Flaccus, Antipater, Herod, Vitellius, Cestius Gallus, and Rufus, might more properly be called the sons or followers of Haman. He also traces Christian ideas in this Targum as well as antichristian, e.g. in the name Bar Pandira, whereby Christ is designated. On the other hand, Mohammedanism is not in the slightest way alluded to, which proves the great antiquity of the Targum.

A word with regard to the translation of the book. I have on the whole been faithful to the author, and, as far as the English idiom allowed it, have reproduced the author's style. I am indebted to the Rev. James Neil, M.A., for his kindness in revising the translation, to the Rev. J. H. Bruhl for translating the excursus on Zoroaster, and to the publishers for their patient attention to the whole work. May it prosper on its way, and be blessed by Him who manifested Himself at all times as the Protector and Redeemer of His people.

THE TRANSLATOR.

INTRODUCTION.

1. THE book of Esther, as we have it in the Hebrew language in the canon of the Old Testament, is one of the most remarkable and instructive writings of ancient Persia. The information which it imparts surpasses in originality even that given by Herodotus ; it is of the same century, but older, and is tinctured with the colour of Persian custom and life more than any other book. It was written in the capital of Persia. It brings the reader into the palace of the king ;—it shows him its throne, with its magnificent surroundings. We obtain from it an insight into the inner life of the royal harem. Indeed, the little book represents a universal harem-history. It makes us better acquainted with King Xerxes, and gives us the original names of his princes and warriors. In spite of its specific Jewish-national motive, it brings us into contact with the political and religious movements that take place in the great empire. Nowhere else is the weakness of the Persian monarch so clearly exhibited as the outcome of his very possession of tremendous power, and of his considering himself as the visible Mithra. The strife which was epidemic in Oriental States, which the stories of the Seven Wise Men everywhere describe,¹ and which was regularly carried on between the viziers of kings and the favourite queens, is here narrated with such a vivid and historical accuracy that has no parallel. First, the queen falls on account of the intrigues of the seven ministers, then the vizier falls on account of the beauty of another queen. One recognises the stamp of genuineness in every trait of the narrative; just that which appears strange at first sight proves the fidelity with which contemporary events are narrated. The doubts which modern writers have raised against this book are owing to their deficiency in the historic sense, and to their want of a thorough acquaintance with Oriental affairs. Indeed, national prejudices contributed to the undervaluing of the book. Hamanic sentiment wanted to throw a veil over the picture of the old Haman, and to declare the book a myth.

~~X~~ Of course, the whole narrative is the expression of a national triumph over intolerance and tyranny, and betrays a national character, just as the narratives of Herodotus and of others, of the Persian wars, sufficiently manifest traits of Hellenic one-sidedness. It is a memoir written by a Jew to all his people who are scattered in the extensive countries of Persia, in which are recorded the wonderful interpositions of Providence in their deliverance from destruction, which appeared to be certain. It has no other purpose but to narrate this; it is not called upon to give information about other things; albeit it gives a picture of Persian court life the like of which is found nowhere else.

The king אַחֲשֹׁרֶשׁ or אַחֲשֹׁרֶשׁ is really Xerxes the First, the son of Darius Hystaspes. The name appears to be an appellative, and represents the genuine form, but which was sometimes pronounced by Greeks Kyaxares and sometimes Xerxes. It is a compound of אַחֲשׁ and רֵשׁ—as אַחֲשָׁרֶפֶן is a compound of דְּרֵפֶן and אַחֲשׁ דְּרֵפֶן (Durban)¹ means officer, servant, and with אַחֲשׁ it means the first servant (satrap) (comp. Dan. iii. 3), so then we have to explain אַחֲשֹׁרֶשׁ as meaning the chief king, or king of kings. רֵשׁ (Rakscha), the Latin rex, Xerxes or Xerx, is also a ξερξ; for אַחֲשׁ corresponds to Khsha or Kyax, which certainly contains the signification of greatness or priority. אַחֲשָׁנָה is also found in the name of Artaxerxes, who is named in Ezra iv. 8, 11, 23, vii. 7, אַרְתָּחֶשֶׁתָּה or אַרְתָּחֶשֶׁתָּה. This is composed of Arta and אַחֲשָׁנָה, and שָׁתָּה or סָתָּה, with which the word Βίστραξ in Hesychius, meaning king, may be compared. So must the name בָּרְשָׁנָה, Cyrus (the sun), be compared with κύριος, and the Persian name Darius, Dara, Darab be compared with τύραννος.

The name of the king, אַחֲשָׁנָה, stands properly in Ezra iv. 6 between Darius and Artaxerxes. With Xerxes are mentioned in the book of Esther as his counsellors and friends, Mardonius, Barzanes, Hydarnes, Aspathines, Prexaspes, and Ahhaemenes. Proper dates are given. If nothing is said about the preparation for the war with Greece, it is because, when this was subsequently written, it was not pleasant to be reminded of the unfortunate issue of that war; yet the date of the assembly given in ver. 3, "the third year of his reign," indicates that in the year 482 preparation for the war was made. If events are narrated which have taken place in the sixth and in the seventh years of the reign of Xerxes, it is because he only returned to Shushan in the sixth year. In the twelfth year, about 474–473 B.C., occurred the catastrophe, and then follows chap. x., where we read: "And the king laid a tribute upon the land and upon the isles of the sea." This is a remarkable notice, and must be understood according to the tenor of the whole book. The narrated fact is represented as the consequence of the deliverance of Israel and of the fall of Haman. The imposition of taxes upon the land and the isles is a sign of their submission. The meaning of the passage obviously is, that since Hamanism has fallen, the power of the Persian king has risen over the land and the isles. The memoir desires to prove that the threatening against the Jews was against the interests of Persia, and that their deliverance from danger contributed to the welfare of the country. It intimates that just as Mordecai conferred a benefit upon the king by disclosing the conspiracy of his servants, so he also became the benefactor of the country in general when he was raised to the office of vizier, because he made the king's prerogatives more respected.

The appearance of Haman on the political arena was evidently the result of a religious Iranic movement. This increased the more after the return of the king from the war, where he met with disastrous reverses which naturally caused dissatisfaction. The attempt of Haman against the Jews had a deep religious-political basis; also in Palestine, as the book of Ezra narrates that the Persian statesmen wrote to the king against the Jews. These statesmen raised considerations with regard to the Jews similar to those which occupied the mind of the Pharaoh who knew not Joseph in Egypt, and to those raised by Mithridates against the Romans, and at times by Turkish sultans against the Christians. All those that did not belong to the religion of Iran were looked upon as political and ecclesiastical enemies, and therefore to be exterminated. Such ideas are not very rare even in modern States. In this sense is also the speech of Haman before the king to be understood.

A more dangerous contrivance against the Jews could not be thought of. But it was averted, and the memoir could assert that just through the deliverance of Israel the Persian power had risen and become great. In fact, the Greek chroniclers are silent concerning further Persian losses till the death of Xerxes; the battle of Eurymedon, 469, was not considered of great importance in official reports of the Persian court; besides, it took place after the memoir was written. The Persians had ceased to attack Greece, but land and isles remained under their protection.

In Persia the enemy of the king was regarded as the enemy of everything good, and even of the Deity, because he was their personified idea of God. Hence the memoir proves that the king derived only good from Mordecai and Esther. There is therefore no greater evidence of the genuineness, contemporariness, and prudence of the Megilla

(scroll) Esther, than the very fact that it does not mention the name of God (יהה). Haman accuses the Jews that they do not keep the דת, laws, of the king. דת is the product of the mind of his royal majesty, who is the representative of the Deity. Beside him no other god must be acknowledged or tolerated. If the Jews observe the דת of their God, they do it in opposition to the king.¹ The book cannot and must not mention the name of the eternal God under the circumstances, when everything depends upon the king. The author is very careful to show that he is the friend of the king, and that his book was not written against him, but against Haman. There is not a word here against the king, although later traditions are full of mocking and hostile epithets against him. It speaks, indeed, of Haman's attempt to kill all the Jews in the name of the king, but it does not omit to mention that they were saved in his name. So, then, in the omission of the name of God, we have here a political act of prudence which it was necessary to adopt by the written contemporary, the king's contemporary. Nevertheless, the strongly-marked Jewish faith appears everywhere. The fasting which Mordecai prescribed was connected with prayer, although the form of the prayer is not given. One thought pervades the whole book, and that is, the wonderful providence by which God protects the house of Israel. It cannot be destroyed even by the malice of such an enemy as Haman. Even Zeresh his wife is represented to be of the same opinion, when she says to him : "If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt not prevail against him." With the deliverance of the Jews is connected the fall of Vashti and, to a certain extent, the Persian War, also the election of Esther as queen, the conspiracy of the eunuchs, the escape of the king, and his sleeplessness. The opposition between Haman and Mordecai is a religious and not merely a personal

one. Mordecai is unwilling to bow his knee before the minister of Hom and of fire. Through this he comes, of course, into the danger of being denounced by Haman and crucified; but in the same night the king reads of his benevolent and loyal act, and he is not killed, but is honoured publicly; yea, Haman himself must impart to him the honours which he in his yain conceit imagined were intended for himself. The saying of Haman, that the Jews were scattered in all lands, and had their own peculiar customs, was not unfounded; but for all that, they were good citizens, and did their duty to the State in spite of their religion. This is clearly shown in the book. Mordecai, though in the midst of Persians, yet scrupulously observes the religious commandments; he uses the names of Jewish months and not of Persian; and it is a fable that the names of the Jewish months originated in Persia.¹

2. The event was indeed extraordinary; never before since the time of Israel's exodus from Egypt did they pass through such great danger. It was the first instance of the outbreak of fanaticism which in later times was often repeated. Their whole existence throughout the wide dominions of Persia was in the balance. The experience they received of the wonderful interposition of God in their behalf made an indelible impression upon them. They had seen before, in their history, the appointment of fasts. The prophet Zechariah says, "The fast of the fourth month, and the fast of the fifth, and the fast of the seventh, and the fast of the tenth, shall be to the house of Judah joy and gladness, and cheerful feasts." But such days of redemption they had not yet experienced. Therefore Mordecai and Queen Esther resolved to commemorate the great event which they themselves had witnessed. They joined their experience of God's redeeming love with the redemption of Israel from Egypt. As the feast of Passover was at all times celebrated with thanksgiving and praise, so should a feast proclaim to all generations the wonderful redemption which their forefathers had experienced. In imitation of the Passover, which began with the fourteenth of Nisan, this feast was also to begin on the fourteenth of Adar. They called it Purim, to remind them of the horoscope which was placed for their destruction, but which led to their deliverance, just as the Passover reminded them by its name of the passing by of the protecting and redeeming angel. Purim also reminded them of Balaam's demoniac attempt to curse Israel, but the curse was turned into a blessing; so now Haman, in accord with Persian custom, placed the horoscope in order to find a day favourable to Israel's destruction.

The undertaking was made in the twelfth year of the reign of Xerxes, probably the twelfth month of the cycle of twelve years, of which it is said that the last was called Swine, which was considered as an unfortunate omen to the people, to whom swine were obnoxious. The thirteenth day of the month Adar was chosen, whose signification was fire, in the sense of consuming also, as March from Mars, Ares whose Greek name is from fire. The thirteenth day (Tir) signifies the arrow. For the king shot the arrow with the bow with which he was equipped, like the sun-god and Mithra, which we explain as meaning archer. But the arrow rebounded. Haman, his adherent, fell instead of Mordecai the Jew. The day became a day of joy instead of the horoscope of the curse. It was therefore quite natural that the day should be called Purim, lottery-day, for it was the day on which the prognostications of the horoscopian were falsified, and the threatened misfortune was turned into fortune. It was a grand thought of Esther and Mordecai, while being conscious that they were chosen by God to be the instruments in effecting a deliverance, to institute a day to commemorate that event. The people should realize a lively sense of the perpetual danger they are in on account of their faith in the midst of the heathen, so that they might the more ardently adhere to it, and never lose sight that God is their Preserver and Redeemer. Mordecai and Esther claimed to have the right which Moses possessed to prescribe a feast for the people which should not only awaken serious thoughts in their minds, but also inspire them with joy and gratitude. When the ancient Jewish teachers ascribed to the book of Esther a certain prophetic character, it was because they foresaw the times when similar accusations to those recorded in this book would be made against the Jews, and they would often need the comfort which the feast of Purim inspires. Indeed, the institution of this feast was the type of the Feast of Hhanukah, or of Dedication, in which Judas Maccabaeus purified the temple. He, too, inspired by his victory over the Syrians, desired that the event should remain indelible. Just as Esther and Mordecai made the Passover to a great extent the basis of the Feast of Purim, so the Maccabees founded the Feast of the Dedication on the prophecy of Haggai, which predicted the coming of a new time from the four and twentieth day of the ninth month (Hag. ii. 18). We have therefore good ground for assuming the authenticity of the report that Mordecai caused the book to be written, and that he furnished the main facts. In chap. ix. 20-23 we not only find traces of this, but also of the appointment and the observance of the feast. (See the explanation in the Commentary.)

We observe that Esther and Mordecai must not be judged by the standard of the gospel, nor must we expect to find in them the tolerating spirit of Jesus Christ. They retaliated and avenged themselves on their enemies in accordance with the prevalent policy and spirit of the East; but who will be so bold as to maintain that the attacks against the Jews from Byzantium to Berlin, from the time of the Crusaders to the recent anti-Semitic movement, had in the slightest possible way been influenced by the Spirit of Jesus Christ? The Hamanism of Berlin knew no more of the Cross than Haman did, or rather they had a desire to crucify. Mordecai had nothing of the apostle and the ascetic in him. He retained the sole character of a praying man after his prayer had conquered ; but in letting himself be invested with the office of vizier, he only wished to show in a visible manner the victory which his people had obtained through the help of God. This little book is remarkable and incomparable in the effect which it has produced upon the national and social life of Israel. Of course, the apostles rose higher to the ideal of true martyrs, because they conquered while they submitted to a violent death ; but, alas ! Mordecai and Esther, although they did not know the gospel, have found more imitators in the Christian Church than Stephen and Paul ; and that without having to save themselves from similar dangers to those of their exemplars. The vengeance which Jews exercised was in self-defence, because their life was not safe even after the deliverance which Esther had effected, so long as the party of Haman remained alive. These would have resumed their former hostile plan as quickly as the unextinguished embers are set ablaze by the least favourable wind that blows upon them.

One must have an historic sense, and imagine himself in ancient Persia, in order to realize the true state of affairs there. Tyranny knew nothing of the right of man ; and if any one obtained justice or favour, he owed it to the humour of the tyrant.

The little book considers, indeed, the whole affair of which it treats only from a religious and national point of view, and removes the history, so to speak, from the universal history of the world ; but that is natural. The persecuted person thinks only of his danger and of his escape ; and the believer thinks only of the wonderful interposition of God which he had experienced.

It is a beautiful thought of the Midrash when it compares Esther to the dawn of the morning. As the dawn announces the end of the night, so the book of Esther terminates in the O. T. the history of miracles.

On the other hand, the history here recorded is the first of the kind within the experience of the people. The remark of the Midrash on chap. xi. is very significant, where, among other enumerations of persons who were first in something, it says, Ahhashverosh was the first buyer and Haman was the first seller of men. For the first time was there such a threatening in their history. Their children were once taken away from them and killed by Pharaoh ; they were also, as a people, taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar, but their whole existence of old and young, of man and wife, was never yet in jeopardy. Such a dreadful danger is not to be mysticized. We read of such in the history of ancient tyrannies and of civil war, but from this history we get the indelible impression that we are reading of the experience of a people who may expect renewed attacks against themselves from the conquering nations among whom they reside. Therefore, no book of the Old Testament has been so much commented on and adorned as this. In its pages, not merely did a voice of warning speak to the generations of Israel, but also a voice of historical comfort. But it is just these many comments and embellishments which testify to the genuineness and authenticity of the Hebrew Persian text, because they display quite a different spirit from that which characterizes the original document.

3. This is already manifest in the additions which accompany the book of Esther in the Septuagint.¹ In these the Jews have no longer any scruple in mentioning their God ; they appear to be anxious to remove beforehand any objections which might be raised against the narrative in Esther, and prove the long use of the book in the congregations of the Jews. Mordecai is represented as defending himself, by saying that it was not pride that prevented him from rendering adoration to Haman, but that he feared to give that homage to a man, which God claims for Himself.

and in the Apocrypha) reveals clearly the whole tendency of these additions. It originated in Egyptian court life, and narrates of such persons who from personal motives had done harm to the princes who elevate them; it refers to examples in ancient history in which such counsellors led their kings to all sorts of evil, and also reminds of the accusations that were brought against bad viziers (as otherwise against queens) which occur in Oriental legends.

Very remarkable is it that Haman is there accused of having entertained the desire of bringing the kingdom of Persia under the rule of the Macedonians.

The author thereby intended to give the appearance of Persian originality to his letter, but he only proves the age in which he wrote, viz. at the time of the Ptolemies, who were themselves in a state of rivalry with one another in the Syrian kingdom; and there he could do it without giving offence. I have already observed in the commentary that the Syrian garrison in Jerusalem at the time of the Maccabees is designated by Josephus with the term Macedonian (Joseph. Ant. xii. 5. 4).¹

We read, that in the fourth year of King Ptolemy and of Cleopatra, this letter became known in Egypt. From the fact that it speaks of Haman as a Macedonian, we may conclude that it refers to the time of war between the Egyptians and Antiochus the Great, which war terminated by the marriage of Ptolemy with Cleopatra the daughter of Antiochus (Joseph. xii. 4. 1). About the Jews the letter speaks intentionally in the name of the King of Persia, "that the Jews are far from being evil-doers, that they live under the most righteous laws, and are the children of the only and true God."

¹ Through the influence of Alexander the Macedonian, and so long as his empire lasted, Greece was confounded with Macedonia. But false readings are not rare, for, as I have shown in my comment to the Second Targum, p. 329, ought not to be read Macedonian. Dr. J. Levy in his Lexicon (as well as the passage in Bab. Yoma and Bereshith Rabba c. xxxvii.) is mistaken if he thinks that Macedonia stands for Media. It stands for Yawan, while פָּרַי ought not to be translated.

The additions were evidently made as early as at the beginning of the third century of the Christian era, perchance in order to diminish the force of the objections which were even then raised against the book of Esther.

The most curious addition is, at all events, the so-called dream of Mordecai. We read: "Behold a noise of a tumult, with thunder, and earthquakes, and uproar in the land. And behold two great dragons (δράκοντες) came forth ready to fight, and their cry was great. And at their cry all nations were prepared to battle, that they might fight against the righteous people. And, lo, a day of darkness and obscurity, tribulation and anguish, affliction and great uproar upon earth (comp. Joel ii. 2). And the whole righteous nation was troubled, fearing their own evils, and were ready to perish. Then they cried unto God; and upon their cry, as it were from a little fountain, was made a great flood, even much water. The light and the sun rose up, and the lowly were exalted, and devoured the glorious." The style is coloured by biblical citations, but the story of the fight of the two dragons rests upon an important Oriental parable. The legend is also given by the Midrash Esther (Amst. ed. p. 94c), where the dragons are not very correctly called חננים, for sea-dragons are not meant. It must appear strange, that if the dragons represent Mordecai and Haman, then Mordecai is also called a dragon; but dragon here (δράκων) is nothing else than a winged daeva, such as the Persians in particular knew. Both the good and the evil daevas were winged. Their appearance was alike, but they had different principles. So Astyages saw in his dream a dragon having the wings of an eagle, and rushing towards him. St. Jude also says that Michael the Archangel was contending with the devil. The same meaning is to be given to Daniel x. 13, where we read: "But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withheld me one and twenty days; but, lo, Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me; and I was left there with the kings of Persia." It is the war of the religion of Israel against the religion of Persia. The same is depicted in the war between the two dragons. The dream shows Mordecai as the representative of Israel, who is fought against and nearly conquered by Haman, but after Mordecai had fasted and prayed there appears suddenly a little spring from which flows abundant and refreshing streams. "The little brooks of God are full of water." "He puts down the mighty from their seat, and exalts the humble and meek." It was owing to Mordecai's personal representation of the principles of the Jews in their strife against Haman that Purim, as we see in 2 Macc. xv. 36, was called Mardocheu's day, the preceding of which, i.e. the 13th of Adar, the Maccabees celebrated with great joy their victory, and called it the day in memory of the execution of Nicanor. But the day of Nicanor is no more remembered, yet Purim remains. The same historical consideration which gave rise to the additions, namely, whether the vengeance of the Jews spoken of in Esther might not excite ill feeling among other nations against them, is also found in the Talmud (Megilla 7a) : "R. Samuel bar Yehudah said: Esther sent a message to the sages saying, Appoint a feast in memory of me for the generations to come. They replied: Thou wilt thereby provoke the nations against us. She then sent them word again. The event is already recorded in the chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia." This sentence is very instructive in enabling us to get an intelligent idea of the Talmudic time. The Rabbis, in order to magnify their authority, and to preclude the supposition that a feast was instituted without their permission, and that the Sanhedrin did not even exist in Persia, have deemed it prudent to tell the story that Esther had applied to the sages to sanction the institution of the feast which bore her name.¹ Thereupon they raised the objection that the record of such an institution which commemorated their triumph over the authorities under which they lived might be detrimental to the Jews in exciting the hatred of the nations against them. This fear (as we shall see) was drawn from their experience of the time in which they lived. She then replied, the fact is already well known in history, there is no secret about it, every one who reads history is cognizant of it. This is even given with greater clearness in the Jerusalem Talmud, according to which the Rabbis said as follows : " Have we not had enough of impending oppressions ? Do you want to increase them by calling to mind the oppression of Haman ? " R. Shimeon ben Nahman said in the name of R. Yonathan : " Eighty-five elders (וּמְהַלְשִׁים נְבִיאִים) have been very sad about this affair . . . they said : Moses has told us : No prophet should add anything from now and henceforth ; and yet Mordecai and Esther desire to appoint a new institution ! But they did not cease to ponder over it, until God opened their eyes and they found (a justification for it), written in the law, and in the prophets, and in books " (Tal. Jerus. Megilla, c. i. p. 9, W. Krotoschin). However peculiar this Talmudic passage may appear, yet it at the same time supplies a strong evidence of the genuineness of the book of Esther. Who could have invented this history, which in itself appeared venturesome to narrate,—it contained not only elements of glory, but also elements of danger for the people ? It not merely strengthened the national consciousness of Israel, but it excited also that of other nations. The Greek and Roman Hamans were the proofs for the Persian. The tears of anguish which the people shed in the Orient and in the Occident were only repetitions of their bitter experience in Shushan. Therefore no feast had such a national background as the feast of Purim had. Both the first and the second Targums, which teem with such considerations, were political and religious memoirs for the people.

Even the New Testament shows how great the importance of Haman and Ahhashverosh was thought to be. In the Gospel of St. Mark vi. 23, Herod Antipas says to his daughter: "Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom." He imitates in this that which Xerxes Ahhashverosh said to Esther (chap. v. 6): "What is thy request? even to the half of the kingdom it shall be performed." From this originated the name Ahhashverosh in the Christian legend which the so-called "Wandering Jew" bore. For Herod and Herodias are the restless ones, and therefore the name was first applied to Herod and then to Nero, who like a frog imitated the lion Ahhashverosh. Still more remarkable and recognisable is the passage in Rev. xiii. 18: "Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man, and his number is 666." This number is incontestably found in Hebrew letters¹ in the name המן רשען, Haman the wicked. For it is—

40 =	ט
50 =	י
200 =	ר
300 =	ש
70 =	ב
1 =	א

666.

It is said of the beast that "he spake as a dragon," which reminds one of the Greek legends of the battle of the dragons in which Haman speaks. We cannot enter at large upon the question as to which of the contemporaries was regarded as Haman by St. John; but so much is certain, that even here Haman was considered as the abstract idea of the dragon and of the ferocious beast. It was therefore natural that the Jews should also in later times designate every powerful enemy who threatened to deprive them of life and property by the name צורך and Haman. Eisenmenger (i. 721) and others had no right to reproach them with this; and what he quotes from the book, תְּמִימָן הַמֶּלֶךְ, represents likewise Haman only as the conception of the dragon, as it is done in the Revelation. The dragon was to be assailed by the Messiah the son of Joseph. Should they have refrained from calling Achmed the vizier of Soliman by this name, who wanted to destroy them all if they would not deliver to him all their gold and silver (1523)? They had, as in the time of Haman, fasted and cried to God; in fact, Achmed fell before he carried out his plans, and the Jews for a long time celebrated on the 27th of Adar an Egyptian feast of Purim (comp. תְּמִימָן הַבָּנָן קָמָע, ed. Vienna, p. 76 and p. 254). Should they not call by the same name Ibrahim Pasha, who was their most bitter enemy (1536), and fortunately for them was thrown over by Soliman? And if they so designated in Frankfurt (1714) the robber and murderer Vincenz Fettmilch, was it not because he treated them in the spirit and after the example of Haman? Certainly no book of the Bible was so popular among the Jews as the book of Esther. It was inculcated that women and children should hear it read in the synagogue on Purim; and that when all the other books of the Bible shall lose their force in the time of the Messiah, it and the Pentateuch will have their full efficacy. They used to adorn and beautify the scroll, and private ones received illustrations.¹ Schudt could not sufficiently express his admiration for an illustrated Megilla scroll for which the scribe asked five florins. The feast of Purim used to excite in the breasts of the Jews triumphant as well as revengeful feelings, for which many opportunities were given them. In this they were not always moderate, and the reproach which the Roman emperor brought against them, that among their figurative representations they caricatured the cross under the image of Haman, was not altogether unfounded; but their persecutors were very moderate in their manifestation towards them of the spirit of the gospel.¹ The Jews used also to show their joy on Purim by distributing gifts; every one was in duty bound to send a מחצית השקל, a half shekel, to Jerusalem or to the pilgrims in the Holy Land generally; and the gifts to the poor were sent early in the morning, in order that they might be able to prepare for the feast in the evening.² And if there were no poor at the time, the money was kept until there were some. The poor also made presents to each other, especially of provisions. Yet a woman dared not send a present to any other man but her husband, and so vice versa. Confectionary alone was not sufficient for presents. What Kirchner³ reports, that the gifts sent consisted of the point of a smoked tongue, peppered and preserved, has reference to the passage in the Talmud Megilla 7a, which speaks of the gifts of pepper and ginger. Pepper was held as symbolic of good sense, and of more value than sweets. They feasted exceedingly well, and practised all those customs which Christians used on Christmas. They were especially fond of the little cakes filled with pap, which were called Kräppelchen (fritters), and which were delightful objects, both to the young and the old.⁴ Whatever could make the poor comfortable and happy was sent to them, because, as the author of the Mezahh Aron⁵ says: "They look, nebich (=poor things), the whole year for Purim."

teenth century) the Jews used also to send gifts to poor Christians on the Feast of Purim. The ancient Rabbis taught that one could not rejoice enough on that feast, just as Francis de Assisi said,¹ he wished it were possible that the walls should also eat meat on Christmas; though there was certainly a great difference in the object of joy. The Jews then made their Purim to vie with the Christian Christmas more than now, when many of them keep Christmas (in Germany) as if it were their own feast. As some Christian authors both seriously and jestingly explained Weihnachten (Germ. for Christmas) as meaning Wein nacht, "the night for wine," so were also the ancient Jewish Rabbis of opinion that one must drink so much on Purim until he will not be able to know the difference between בָּרוּךְ מֹרְדַּכַּי (blessed be Mordecai) and אָרוּר הָמָן (cursed be Haman). It is very curious that the two phrases are numerically the same, viz. 502, just as the word בָּשָׂר.² It is told in the Talmud that R. Abaye and R. Hhananayh, having been very merry on Purim, had by mistake exchanged their meals, but being poor, when they came to dine together they knew not the difference. Another Purim story which might have ended very seriously is told of Rav. He and R. Sera dined together, and they got so intoxicated that the former slaughtered the latter. But the next morning God wrought a miracle, and the dead man was restored to life. The next Purim, Rav invited his friend again to dine with him, but he declined the invitation, saying: "I will not risk my life this time, for not always do miracles happen." forbade Christians accepting gifts from Jews. In the Canon Apost. n. 70 (Patr. Apostl.), ed. Coteler (new ed. ² Even in the Piut (poetical meditation) for Purim we read,—

כְּפָרִים עִם נְרָדִים

שְׁתוּ וְשִׁבְרֻוּ דָוִדִּים, etc.

The feast was kept with great solemnity ; the thirteenth day of Adar, which was formerly the anniversary of the victory over Nicanor, was afterwards observed as a fast, and called תענית אסתר, the fast of Esther ; it was for the purpose of reminding them in the midst of the joys and pleasures of Purim of the great distress they had once passed through. There is no prescribed rule for it in the book of Esther, nor was it yet inserted in the index of fasts in Megillath Taanith. In the evening of the same day, the synagogue is well illuminated, and the minister unfolds the whole scroll and reads the narrative. When he comes to the passages which speak of Mordecai and of the final victory, the people repeat them after him in a loud voice and triumphant manner ; but when the name of Haman is mentioned, then the young people, and especially the children, make a great noise, and knock at the benches as if they were to kill him again. The Jews were wrongly reproached for expressing their feelings of approval of Mordecai and of hatred to Haman in this dramatic spectacle. But similar scenes used to take place in the Roman Catholic Church in Passion Week, when, after the candles were extinguished, a great noise was made in imitation of the tumult which the Jews raised before Pilate. We read in an old book : "On Good Friday people rattle and make a noise in the Church."¹ And not only so, but scenes were exhibited in which Martin Luther in the effigy of an active boy received terrible blows, such as the Jews have not dealt to Haman. For the latter did only strike on wood and stone, and not men ; but not so the former. Johannes Pauli tells an old story of a peasant who was frightened in the scene on Good Friday, in which, while the singing was going on, the priest put out one candle after the other, and then "every man began to beat and to strike as on such nights was the custom in the Papacy."² The sermons which were preached in the synagogue on Purim were pervaded by an earnest tone (comp. Megilla 11a). R. Dimi bar Yitzhak took for his text Ezra ix. 9 : "For we were bondmen ; yet our God hath not forsaken us in our bondage, but hath extended mercy unto us in the sight of the kings of Persia." R. Hhanina bar Papa took for his text Ps. lxvi. 12 : "Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads ; we went through fire and through water, but Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place." R. Yohhanan took for his text Ps. xcvi. 3 : "All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God." That happened in the days of Mordecai and Esther.¹ The ancient Christian Church held Esther in high esteem, as she highly deserved, for risking her life for the sake of her religion and her people. The Church knew how to appreciate the martyr's spirit, and she had a higher instinctive knowledge of the wonderful dealings of God with His ancient people than many modern theologians have. In the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians we read : "And Esther, whose faith was perfect, exposed herself to danger when she undertook to deliver the twelve tribes of Israel from imminent destruction. With fasting and humility she prayed to the Lord, the Creator of all things, the eternal God, who, when He saw the affliction of her soul and the dangers which she encountered, delivered the people for her sake."

Clement of Alexandria² spoke in a similar strain : "That Esther who was perfect in faith delivered Israel from the power of the tyrant and from the cruelty of the satrap, and a single woman, bent down by fasting, resisted myriads of armed men, and by faith destroyed the tyrannical law. And she appeased the one, and the other, Aman, she removed, and by prayer preserved Israel in safety." In another place he says (Paid. lib. ii. p. 216) : "The one Esther we find rightly adorned. She adorned herself mystically (μυστικῶς) before her king, but her beauty effected the deliverance of her people from murder." Jerome, too, writes in his letter to Paulinus : " Esther as a type of the Church delivered the people from danger, and after the death of Haman, which name signifies iniquity (iniquitas), she instituted a supper and a feast for posterity" (ed. Migne, i. 547). In his defence against Rufinus he says : " Let Esther be imitated, who long and silently endured the opinions of Artaxerxes, but at last corrected him by the truth" (ed. Migne, ii. 412, 413). Also in his introduction to Zephaniah (ed. Migne, vi. 1337) he speaks of Judith and Esther, who as a type of the Church had destroyed the enemies of Israel, and saved them from destruction. This honour of Esther to be a type of the Church was naturally developed from the whole Christian tradition, which regarded her as a type of the Virgin Mary. This often occurs in hymns. In a hymn, dating from the fourteenth century, we find the phrase : " Haec Esther imperatrix."¹ Another hymn from the same century is as follows :—

“ Hodie cubiculum
Regis Hester suscipit
Sedare periculum
Quod hostilis officit
Aman restans fraudibus
Pro peccati videntibus Mortem mundo conficit.”

Remarkable is what is contained in a Litany,—

“ O Maria, regis veri
Virga aurea Assueri
Iram judicis severi
Scis lenire ut mederi
Malit quam pereutere.”

Much is said of the rod, i.e. the sceptre of Ahhashverosh, with which he indicated his favour to Esther. Not only is Mary styled in another hymn as the rod (virgula Assueri Aman tu mortifera sis adiutrix cleri), but also in the famous poem of Gottfried of Strassburg;¹ the favour which the king showed to Esther by the sign of the rod was the type of the favour which God shows through the Virgin. For Ahhashverosh was thought to represent God, Aman represents Satan, and Esther the saving Mary. Specially strange, notably in reference to the Jews, is the moralizing of the Gesta Romanorum (lat. 177), where Ahhashverosh is compared with Christ, and Queen Vashti with the synagogue. Vashti, who refused to come to the royal table, resembled the Jews, who, according to the parable, refuse to come to the Lord's Supper. Esther is the Church, which comes in her place. Haman, the mortal enemy of the Jews, is in the person of the Jewish people the Antichrist, who wants to hang Mordecai, the type of the righteous.

When Queen Esther invites the king to come to her banquet, she resembles the Church, which Christ invites to come to partake of His body.²

The fast of Esther was spoken of as typical of the merit of fasting during the Quadragesima.³

She was also regarded by the Church as a saint. The ² Gesta Romanorum, n. 177, ed. Oesterley, p. 577. Owing to this honour which Ahhashverosh received in the Church, it also came to pass that his name was frequently given to persons even in the Protestant times. Fritzsche, a well-known theologian and liturgist, bore that name. Ahhashverosh Brandt was a famous physician who undertook a journey to Moscow (comp. Rhesa Litth. Dainos, p. 351). Another by the same name was Professor in Bremen (Hamberger, Gelehrte Deutschlands, i. p. 5). The mysticism of the name of Esther found a place in Reformed circles. In the terrible commotions which took place in Elberfeld and Ronsdorf, the sectarian Eller left his wife Vashti, and took another whom he called Esther (comp. Göbel, Gesch. des christl. Lebens, iii. 470). In England, too, Christian women were called Esther, and shortened into Essie (comp. Charnock, Phenomena, p. 41). So also the handsome wife of Casimir of Poland was named Esther.

editor of the Bible of Royaumont calls her une sainte femme. In Calmet's Bible it is said : "The Church Fathers make this holy queen (sainte reine) appear as a figure of the Church of Jesus Christ."

She is represented upon images in the attitude of kneeling before King Ahhashverosh, who reaches her the sceptre, while this sceptre expresses tenderness.¹ Her saint's day is differently given: May 24 or July 1. The Copts keep it December 20. The editors of Acta Sanctorum decided for September 4. In old Martyrologies are found the words : "Hester regiae" or "Hester reginae."² The Jesuit Canisius remarked on this : "The beautiful and faithful, who with the aid of Mordecai saved the whole Jewish people from a threatening danger." A similar sentiment is found in collections of Greek sentences—

μνήμη τῆς δικαιαστοῦ Εσθήρ τῆς λυτρωσαμένης
τὸν Ἰεραπήλ εἰς θανάτου.

The poems and popular books which treat of the book of Esther are numerous. John Chryseus wrote Histori Hester, a play translated from the Latin into German, Wittenberg 1546; towards the end of the sixteenth century appeared Hamanus Tragoedia, which was written first in Latin by Thoma Naogeorgo, and then in German by Joh. M. Moeshemio and Mag. Joh. Postio. The same has been republished in good German by Damianus Lindner in 1607. Older than all these is a book with the following long title: "A very beautiful, pleasant, and comforting play from the Holy Scripture and the book of Esther, composed in short rhyme, in which is shown how God has at all times punished pride and self-will of the wicked, and rewarded the piety and humility of godly men and women." 1537. Hans Sachs has also elaborated the narrative. An alliterative Anglo-Saxon treatise of the book of Esther is not yet printed. It is ascribed to Aelfric who lived in the eleventh century.¹ There was also a scriptural play by Lopa de Vega, entitled *La hermosa Ester*² (Comedias appeared in Madrid in 1621, xv. p. 151). There was a Judeo-German play, entitled אַחֲשֹׁרֶשׁ שְׁפֵל, printed in 1708 and communicated by Schudt in his Jewish Curiosities. It is peculiar, but not without merit. This play has given occasion to Wagenseil to make the incredible assertion, and that in opposition to Cuper, that the whole dramatic art has originated among the Jews.³ Several travellers (as, e.g., Stochowe and Thévenot)⁴ have reported the tradition that Safed in Galilee was the birthplace of Queen Esther. This appears to be connected with another opinion, that Safed is identical with Bethulia, where Judith lived. In the reports of Jewish travellers (as of Yihhus ha Abod)⁵ it is told that the tomb of Esther is at Kefar Baram, not far from Safed. This must refer to a mural monument of Esther; as it was believed among the Jews (from Benjamin of Tudela and others) that the famous tombs of Mordecai and Esther were in Hamadan. It is told that on Purim the Jews of Safed went to the grave, and there read the Megilla, ate and drank, and made merriment. It does not appear very credible that they would do this at a grave.

The name Bethulia, which was given to Safed, in connection with the above legend, may have arisen from the fact that the Hebrew word בָתּוֹלָה, virgin, is found in the name (comp. Esth. ii. 19). A similar legend⁶ reports that a bird flew into the room when Esther was born, as an emblem of liberty and intellect. What a pity that the bird did not fly into the studies of many of the commentators on the book of Esther!

4. We add a few literary notices.

With regard to the literature, see Wolf's Bibliotheca, tom. ii. 89. To this may be added the dissertation of B. L. Eskuche, Marburg 1734, who consulted the then known literature, and the Talmud and Midrash. The Roman Catholic commentaries are little used. That by Feuardentius was consulted by Prof. Dr. Schulze in his Commentary in Lange's Bibelwerk (1876). Prof. Sepp has, with respect to this book, deviated from the spirit and the piety of the Catholic expositors. Intent to bring about a church reform, he began with the revision of the canon of Scripture, which he proposed before the Vatican Council, but which rightly took no notice of it. He agitated against it with anti-Semitic hatred, but without profound learning (Munich 1870).¹ On the other hand, there are two thick volumes of commentary on Esther, which the Benedictine Monk, J. A. Nickes, published in Rome (1858), in which he manifests a spirit of piety and diligence, but he is deficient in scientific criticism and study of the book itself. Besides the books that are alluded to in Keil's Introduction and in Schulze's Commentary, I mention the following Jewish commentaries: כונחה אל מלחת אכתר, by Reggio (Vienna 1841). Abr. Aben. Ezrah, Commentary on the Book of Esther, edited by Joseph Zedner, London (Nutt) 1850. The Commentaries on Esther, Ruth, and Lamentation, by R. Menahhem ben Hhelbo, R. Tobia ben Eliezer, R. Joseph Kara, R. Samuel Ben Meir, and an anonymous author, published by Adolf Jellinek (Leipzig 1855). I add to this Liber Estherae Gracce, by O. F. Fritzsche (in two parts, as contributions to the Index Lectionum), Zürich 1848, which he already at this time received into the collection of apocryphal Scriptures. With regard to poetry founded on Esther, I refer to the notices in the Annals of the History of the Jews, iii. 75, such as a drama Usque by Solomon, and the epic poem Copia Sullam by Sarah. Of course, the most curious of all is Ahhashverosh and Esther, a drama from the East, by Dr. J. L. Chronik (Berlin 1875).¹

It is much to be deplored that Jews distinguished themselves prominently in introducing rationalistic and unscientific doubts against the book of Esther, and that these were not obscure men. It was Spinoza (see Keil, Introd. p. 473) whom Gesenius, Bertheau, Ewald, Meier, etc., followed, who placed the date of the book of Esther in the time of the Ptolemies and Seleucian kings, for which there is no ground, and against which everything speaks. The criticism of Zunz was not so great as his diligent compilation of the fragments of post-biblical literature. What Fürst observes on the book of Esther (Der Kanon des alten Testaments, Leipzig 1868, p. 105) is a thoroughly unscientific conception of the Talmudical passages about the Megilla. To the followers of the rationalism of Spinoza and his disciples belonged also Herzfeld in his History of the Jews (ii. 358). Incomprehensible are the insinuations of Grätz (in the Monatschrift für Wissenschaft des Judenthums, 1886, p. 425). Jewish authors particularly should take the trouble to dig deeply into the history of ancient Israel. To catch the spirit of universal history is a conditional qualification for true exegesis, which

Ahhashverosh and Esther Burn the lair Of the black revolution In pitch of infatuation. They wash the tresses Of the dirty heads.	They cut for the blacks The thread of the Fates. They teach the Moors, They teach them Mores. Born were the Moors To become Kidores, etc.

Skutsche in Breslau published a humorous, satirical Purim play with song in five acts, entitled Haman, der grosse Judenfresser, which I did not see.

qualification even Spinoza and Zunz did not possess. Hasty formulas were found for hasty assertions of unauthenticity and interpolation. Anti-Semitism needed only to appropriate the exegetical arts of rationalism in order to break the stave over the people, amongst whom some so carelessly handled their own canon of the Scripture.

Paul Lagarde (Bötticher) has recently brought out about Purim a learned treatise; its conclusion is impossible to accept. I hope to be able to enter upon it at large elsewhere. With regard to the short treatise by Jules Oppert, Commentaire historique et philologique du Livre Esther, Paris 1864, I have referred to it in the Commentary.

CHAPTER I.

וַיְהִי בַּיּוֹם—“Now it came to pass in the days.”

The rabbinical teachers make peculiar observations upon these words. R. Levi says (Bab. Megilla 10b) there is a tradition from the time of the Great Synagogue, that wherever in the Scriptures a sentence begins with “וַיְהִי, it was,” it indicates a time of sorrow and distress (צער). R. Ashe says that this is only the case when a scriptural sentence begins with וַיְהִי בַּיּוֹם, “and it was in the days.” In fact both views are of ancient date. In another place (Midrash Esther 85b) one is assigned to R. Eliezer and the other to R. Jonathan, from which we conclude that these two authorities lived in the days following the destruction of the temple, in times of great need and distress. The latter view only was the prevalent one (comp. Yalkut Esther, § 1044 [where the passage is not correctly quoted], and the first Targum). Moreover, the ancient sages found the idea of sadness intimated by the very sound of the Hebrew word vayēhee, which is similar to woe. The Greek oīai (the Latin vae of earlier occurrence) had the same sound and character, and was at the time used by the people (as Christ used it Matt. xi. 21, xxiv. 19; Mark xiii. 17). It was at that time not unusual for homiletical teachers to use, in the ecclesiastical Hebrew and in the popular Greek language, forms of expression which contained a combination of ideas in order to serve the purpose of their teaching. Even the Greek translation of Scripture offers examples: the exclamation of woe in the Old Testament חֵי (especially in Isaiah) וְאֵ is not only rendered by oīai, but also in Ezek. vii. 26, חֵה עַל הָזֶה, event upon event (or R. V. "Mischief shall come upon mischief") is translated by וְנַזֵּת. This was occasioned by the sound of the word.

The five verses, concerning which the above observation is made, are as follows: (1) Gen. xiv. 1, "And it came to pass in the days of Amraphel;" (2) Ruth i. 1, "And it came to pass in the days when the judges judged;" (3) Isa. vii. 1, "And it came to pass in the days of Ahaz;" (4) Jer. i. 3, "It came also in the days of Jehoiakim;" (5) in our passage, "It was in the days of Ahhashverosh." A sixth passage was overlooked, viz. 2 Sam. xxi. 1, perhaps because it does not read וְיָהִי רָעַב בִּימֵי דָוִד but וְיָהִי בִּימֵי, and perhaps also from a desire not to place David in juxtaposition with Amraphel, Ahaz, Jehoiakim, and Ahhashverosh.

Now it would not be correct to assume that the observation of the Jewish teachers, of which we speak, is a complete homiletical form after their mode of thinking. It is true that all verses which begin with "it was in the days" introduce a catastrophe. They are things of impending danger which are to be narrated.

The occurrences are of a sad character. They are such disastrous events as the Greek calls συμφορά, so that this word is associated with gloom and sadness. The Hebrew word is to be understood in a similar sense. Though it really means only an event, an occurrence, it has been explained as denoting mishap and mischief.

But the Jewish teachers who called attention to this, namely, that it is to a certain degree the historical style to begin a narrative of eventful catastrophes with the expression, "And it was in the days," have thereby had nothing else of more importance in view. They themselves lived in trouble and distress (צָרָה and צָעֵר), and only saw these, else they would have taught in a more comforting strain, that all the five catastrophes which begin with וְיָהִי בִּימֵי, are only told for the reason that they emerge in the glorious events of the history of the kingdom of God.

Gen. xiv. 1 begins with the war of the kings of the East against Canaan, but concludes with the victory of Abraham and with the benediction of Melchizedek, who as priest of the Most High God brings wine and bread, and says, "Blessed be Abram of God Most High, possessor of heaven and earth." The history of Ruth does indeed begin with a famine, but it ends with the joyful event of the marriage of the converted heathen woman with the Israelite in whom is no guile, with Boaz of whom sprang David and David's greater Son.

In the days of Jehoiakim (Jer. i. 3) there was indeed misery and trouble in Judea, but Jeremiah is called to see the fulfilment (i. 11). In the days of Ahaz there was fearful backsliding and idolatry (Isa. vii. 1), but the narrative only introduces the announcement of the prophet, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel" (ver. 14).

It is introduced with a catastrophe in order to conclude with glory. It is not told on account of the existing evil, but on account of the coming salvation. The history begins with the night, in order to conclude with the dawn of the morning. The days of Ahhashverosh serve for the purpose of revealing the redeeming grace of God. In the days of Ahaz the good tidings are declared which shall set free the whole world. The Roman historian Livy, in describing the days of ruin which came upon Rome through Brennus, says the latter exclaimed, "Vae victis," "woe to the conquered;" and he remarks, that "this is an intolerable expression to Romans" ("intoleranda Rominis vox," Liv. v. 48). But wherever the Scripture begins with its יְהִי בַּיּוֹם, with a "vae Israelis," it reports this only in order to reveal that salvation will soon come forth, whose fulness and blessing is indispensable and unspeakable.

The Greek version of the LXX. translates the Hebrew word יְהִי in all passages with "ἐγένετο," in harmony with the historical style of the Old Testament; thus in Luke ii. 1, ἐγένετο δὲ ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκείναις, "it was in those days" (יְהִי) (בַּיּוֹם הֵם).

In the days when Augustus caused the Holy Land to be taxed its bondage began; but just in consequence of this taxing, the Messiah, who makes all who believe in Him free, was born in Bethlehem.

אַחֲשָׁרוֹשׁ הוּא אַחֲשָׁרוֹשׁ—“In the days of Ahhashverosh, that Ahhashverosh.”

It would have been sufficient to say, in the days of Ahhashverosh, who ruled from India unto Cush; but the repetition of the name in connection with הוּא, ille, iste qui, is a pregnant indication of the significance of the man spoken of.

When, therefore, the Midrash Esther, p. 86a, compares this mode of expression with similar ones, as in 1 Chron. i. 27, הָא עָשָׂו אָבִי אֶדוֹם, and Gen. xxxvi. 3, אֶבְרָם הוּא אֶבְרָהָם, etc., it does so improperly. In the passages quoted, the word הוּא has simply the sense of qui idem, and establishes the identity of the compared persons, as their names and epithets do not fully sound alike (as וּ, which, as a complete relative, is like the new pers. c'eh). But here, where the same name is connected by הוּא, the explanation of mere identity cannot hold good, but, through the repetition of the name, הוּא receives the meaning of the Latin ille.¹ And the sense is: that famous and renowned Ahhashverosh, even more known than Cyrus and Darius amongst European and West Asiatic nations. The Talmud (Megilla 11a) by way of homily remarks, that in all places where הוּא occurs it expresses the virtue or the vice of the person from beginning to end. But the thought in connection with him, as intimated by the identifying pronoun הוּא, was, that Esau was in his character all his life long an Esau, the father of Edom, just as Abram was by nature and grace always an Abraham (Gen. xvii. 5). But here also the historical significance of the expression “Ahhashverosh, that Ahhashverosh,” because it is not repeated in the Bible, was not sufficiently considered nor emphasized. This peculiar formula does already in itself indicate that we have to think of a famous Ahhashverosh, and that the king of the book of Esther is none other, as shown in the Introduction, than Xerxes of the Greek writers, the son of Darius Hystaspes, whom the cuneiform inscriptions, according to Lassen (Keilinschr. p. 165, etc.), call K'shars'a, and according to Benfey (Keilinschr. p. 65, etc.) K'hshyársha.

The twenty years of the reign of this king contain the great decisive points which through him affected the world-wide nations of antiquity,—the Jews and the Greeks,—and the memorable deliverances from calamity and distress which both experienced. The Greek histories know Xerxes mostly only as a commander of armies, and on the battlefield. The book of Esther reports him as he was in his court and in his seraih. Therefore it is just these last reports, notwithstanding that they have Israel for their central point, which show us the external movements within the Persian empire, as the result of former events. Bearing this in mind, it appears clear that the opinion of R. Levi (Meg. Esther 86b), that Ahhashverosh is identical with Artahhasta mentioned in the book of Ezra, is not to be accepted, and has only arisen (as already shown in the Introduction) from the reading of Ezra vii. 1. He cannot be Artahhasta (i.e. Artahhsharshta or Artashsh, Artaxerxes), for the prefixes distinguish the names of the Persian kings from each other. The termination is mostly, as Hewdot observes (i. 139), the same letter which the Dorians call san, and the Ionians sigma (σ). Comp. Khurush (כְּרָשׁ), Daryawush (דָּרַיוּשׁ), Ahhashverosh, Hakhamanish, Chish-pish (Teispes), Fravartish, Dadarshish, Serish, and many others.

This is not explanatory of the former clause, “that Ahhashverosh.” It is not meant to say that it happened in the days of the king who ruled over a wider extent of territory than any other; for Darius had already extended the borders of his dominion from India unto Cush ; and to some extent can the same be said of Cambyses.

In the cuneiform inscriptions Darius and Xerxes have the same majestic titles. What is meant to be conveyed is, that Xerxes was not only king of Persia when this happened, but also that his dominion extended from India unto Cush, i.e. from east to west, from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof.

Benfey translates a cuneiform inscription both of Darius and Xerxes as follows : “ I, the mighty king, king of kings, king of populous countries, king of this great and mighty earth, far and near.” Aeschines mentions in his oration against Ktesiphon, chap. xlvi. (comp. Brisson, de R. Pers. iii. 73), a letter in which Xerxes had written that he was lord over all men, from the rising to the setting of the sun. Mardonius in his speech to Xerxes mentions the victories of the Persians over the Sakes, the Hindoos, and the Ethiopians¹ (Herod. vii. 9). Only through the repetition of the name joined by the pronoun וְהַ is the famous celebrity of the reigning king indicated.

That he swayed his sceptre from Hodu to Cush was merely the title of the great king. The Jewish Rabbis are therefore wrong when they interpret these words as indicating that he was a usurper, and not of royal descent (Yalkut, 1045, and therefore Rashi, in loc.). This cannot be maintained of Xerxes (comp. Herodotus, vii. 3), and the words of Scripture give no occasion to such an assumption. Nor could they have had Smerdis in mind ; for if they had known of him, they would have also known that his reign was short. There seems rather to pervade the interpretation of the Midrash a stronger tone of antipathy and censure than we perceive in the book of Esther itself. This hostile feeling is apparently only directed against Ahhashverosh, but in reality it is meant in spirit against the Roman emperors of the time, who certainly were often more arbitrary than the great Persian king.

Hodu (הודו), for India, is the only passage where it occurs, and shows the local origin of the book of Esther. The cuneiform inscription of Lassen and Benfey has Hidhu. On the other hand, Nasal, which is found in the Indian Sindhu, is in Zendic Hendu. The name denotes originally only the land of the seven streams of the Indus; it was afterwards applied to the eastern territories also (comp. Lassen, Ind. Alterth. i. p. 2). To derive the name Indus from the Sanscrit ind=und, to flow (as also Indra was explained), as the god of rain, is doubtless correct (comp. my Engländer in Delhi, p. 10). Darius pushed forward with his armies as far as the countries around the Indus, and subjected them (Herod. iv. 44). Their people formed the twentieth district of his dominions, and afforded a rich revenue (Herod. iii. 94).

כוש עוזר—“Unto Cush.”

The usual explanation of Cush is Ethiopia, by which we are reminded of the victories of Cambyses over Upper Egypt. The LXX. has therefore left “Unto Cush” untranslated, perhaps because it was so near home. But we must call attention to something else. The name Cush is not limited by local conditions, but rather describes certain tribes of a defined mode of life; therefore Nimrod the hunter is derived from it. The Cossaei (in the present Chusistan), according to the scanty information that we have of them, are scarcely distinguished in their warlike habits from the Sakes, by which name Herodotus also designates the Persians as Scythians. That the name Cush could also be applied to these, I believe that I have shown, in that the legendary hero Rustem of the country of the Sakes (Sadjestan) appears as Cushan (see my Commentary on Judges, chap. iii. p. 33). They are then dark nations of Scythian (Nimrodian) mode of life, which must be understood under the term Cush. In this sense their spread becomes explicable. We can see the force of the saying of the prophet Habakkuk, “I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction ; the curtains of the land of Midian did tremble” (chap. iii. 7). The name Ethiopia is to a certain degree only a translation of Cush, for כוֹת or כוֹת signifies dark.¹ Comp. the Sanscr. Khad, and the Gr. σκότος.

Antiquity also clearly distinguished these formidable Scythian nations of the steppes of Europe and Asia according to their colours. The extensive custom of calling the victorious nations white and the conquered nations black (comp. my Magyar Alterth. p. 144), refers to natural marks of distinction. Cush, as the son of Ham, was the dark contrast to the fair nations of Gomer, the son of Japhet, somewhat like the dark and the dark brown nations in contrast to the Germanic nations of light complexion. Accordingly, it would not be impossible to think of the term “Unto Cush” as defining the limit of the campaign of Darius against the Scythians or Sakes ; but this is out of consideration. Cush expresses here, in general, the extreme limit. As Homer places the Ethiopians at the setting of Helios, and at the extreme ends of the world (Odyss. i. 24), so India and Cush stand opposite to each other for the lands of sunrise and of sunset. It was thought that in the empire of the Persian great kings the sun never set. This idea the Jewish teachers have rightly perceived, as e.g. Rav said, “Hodu and Cush mark the two extreme boundaries of the world.”

“Hundred and seven and twenty provinces.”

This enumeration also testifies to the original historical value of our book with regard to the history of the ancient Iran. I should like to see an impartial acknowledgment that this is in accord with the other credible records of the division of the old Persian kingdom. For the differences which, according to Brisson (de Regn. Pers. lib. i. 169), were thought to exist, are not really there. In Dan. vi. 1 we read that Darius the Mede appointed over the kingdom 120 satraps. Whoever this Darius might have been, the report is really not at variance with what Herodotus tells (iii. 89), that Darius the son of Hystaspes appointed twenty governors. For these twenty satrapies were large divisions, which included smaller ones, like provinces and counties. The first province consisted of Ionians, Magnetians, Aeolians, Karians, Lycians, to which also belonged the Milyans and Pamphilians. So also the third province consisted of Hellespontians, Phrygians, Asiatic Thracians, Paphlagonians, Mariandians, and Syrians. As these provinces had just six divisions, we may assume that all the twenty satrapies had each six smaller revenue districts, called מִדִּינָה,¹ so that there were in all 120 such districts. When Josephus (Antiq. x. 11. 4) speaks of 360 provinces, he makes the mistake of assigning to each of the 120 revenue districts three governors, while he knows himself that only the 120 governors had a revision college of three superiors over them.

A closer investigation concerning the revenue provinces in Herodotus will show that Persia is really wanting among them.² The central governing country holds a special position among the subjugated countries. Therefore there are twenty-one countries³ which the inscription of Bisutun⁴ enumerates (ed Benfey, p. 8), because Persia stands at the head of them. Attention has often been called to the fact that seven tribal chiefs have hurled the Persian Smerdis from his throne. The passage in Plato (De Legg. iii. 659) which appears so obscure nevertheless clearly shows that in his time there yet existed to a certain degree the right and liberty which these seven had established in Persia. Further on more will be told of the seven great men (i. 14), the first in the kingdom, who hold interview with the king, which, according to Herodotus, was the privilege of the friends of Darius. Persia proper, accordingly consists of seven tribes¹ or divisions, which together with the 120 other countries make the total number of 127; but it must not be overlooked that the number 127 is an indivisible one. A homily of R. Akiba declares that Esther was elevated to reign over 127 provinces, because she was a descendant of Sarah, who lived just 127 years (Megilla Esther 86d).

Ver. 2. "That in those days, when the king Ahhashverosh sat on the throne of his kingdom, which was in Shushan the capital."

The first verse mentions the ruler from whom the event proceeded, to introduce the history and to throw light upon it. The second verse exhibits the place in the kingdom where it happened. The third verse sets forth the year of the reign, and the occasion which produced the narrated catastrophe. There appears, in beautiful simplicity, a fine premeditated historical art in the composition.

In ייְהִי, "it was in the days of Ahhashverosh," is recorded the whole reign of the king; but the expression "in these days," points out that the memorable event took place when the great king sat on his throne in Shushan. For during the hot season the king left the capital and took up his residence in cooler Ecbatana in Media.² Some writers have been more precise on this point, and assigned the sojourn of the king at Shushan to the season of spring, at which time the weather is most lovely there even now, in spite of the city being in ruins (see Rawlinson in Ritter, ix. 302). The reason for this may be, because the king returned to his capital to celebrate the festival of the new year in spring.

For Shushan, though very much embellished by Darius, had already been the capital since the accession of the Persian dynasty. Xenophon in the Cyropaedia does rightly speak of Cyrus sojourning there (lib. viii. 6). It was probably on account of its splendid situation, surrounded by mountains and streams, and abounding in fruit and flowers, especially the lily שִׁיר,¹ which gave it its name. It had already become so attractive to the older monarchs as to induce them to choose it for their residence. But this was not the only reason why the Persian monarchs made it their residence. When the Medes and the Persians became masters over the whole complex territory of the Assyro-Babylonian empire, they soon perceived that in order to become great kings they must come out of the national, local, and tribal surroundings. As the later Caliphs left Arabia and established their seat of government in Bagdad, so did the Medo-Persians leave their tribal territories in order to found the capital in the subjugated countries. Babylon could not enjoy this honour, because it would recall the hostility of the old form of government, although the assertion may be well grounded, that Cyrus resided there for some months. Shushan became, especially since the time of Darius, the official, magnificent, famous residence of the Persian kings, as it certainly had never been before. The observations which we have in the ethnographical table of Gen. x. are of inestimable value. They teach us that there was a national distinction between the nation of the Babylonian-Assyrian empire and their confederates; and not only between those who were sons of Ham, but also between Elam, Ashur, Arpachshad, Lud, and Aram, who were descended from Shem, and the nations of Madai, to which also belonged Paras.

¹ Spiegel in Eranische Alterthumskunde, ii. 623, does not give the reason why he is not convinced of this etymological derivation, but holds it as suitable. Any other explanation is not to be thought of.

When the Persians established the capital in Shushan, they found themselves in Elam, that is, outside their national country, and yet in its vicinity—in subjugated but in peaceful countries, as Strabo remarks (comp. Dunker, ii. 593).

As a centre and seat of the great kingdom the city is characterized by the appellation of ^{הַבִּירָה}¹ habeera (meaning properly, the castle, and in an especial sense the royal castle, the residence), as Shushan is everywhere called by Nehemiah (i. 1) and Esther and Daniel, even without special personal reference to the reigning king. For in the fortified castle was the seat of the king.

In a similar manner have modern cities received a compound name, as Edinburgh, Petersburg, etc. For this reason it ought never to have been questioned that Daniel could not speak of any other capital but that of Shushan, which he calls ^{הַבִּירָה}, or that there is a difference between this and the Shushan of Esther and the Greeks (as Ritter thinks, influenced by Rawlinson).—Apart from all verbal and archaeological reasons, it must appear from the spirit of the vision of Daniel, in which he sees the decisive battles of the Medo-Persians with Alexander, that the vision took place in the centre and seat of the Iranic dynasty. It must clearly appear from the same internal evidence that the vision was seen by him near the river Ulai, because this river was connected with the great glory of the Persian kings. It flowed whither the king went—as if the glory of the royal residence went everywhere with him ; for, as it is said, the great king drank no other water but from its springs.

It ought also to be observed, that though the river near Shushan is elsewhere called Choaspes (comp. the passages in Brisson, i. 1. 9, 82), Ulai and Choaspes are not on that account two rivers, as some in ancient and modern times have thought ; Loftus, for instance, who deems it necessary to establish new theories concerning the changes of rivers (see Journal of the Royal Geographical Society, vol. xxvii. p. 130, etc.; comp. Rödiger, Zeitschr. deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch. xiii. 715). But Eulaeus-Ulai is the name which Choaspes bore owing to the fact that it alone contained the pure water of which the king drank.

The Midrash has, p. 87a, the following homiletic legend : The angels appeared before the Lord with the complaint, "Lord, the holy temple is destroyed, and this wicked man שָׁר sits on the throne in joys." But their attention is called to the ways of judgment and to the changes of the times. These had come to pass in an awful manner. Shushan lies in ruins, so that one might doubt its identity. It has become a desert, an habitation for lions and hyenas. Superstitious fanatical robbers are its custodians. Benjamin of Tudela found the country deserted as early as in the twelfth century, and he describes the ruins of the palace of Ahhashverosh (ed. Asher, p. 73). He could still report of a large number of Jewish inhabitants ; but they also have gone, according to the reports of Petachia (ed. Carmoly, p. 65). Not before 1851 were extensive investigations undertaken among these ruins. But though, indeed, the proud capital of ancient Persia is destroyed, the Jews have as yet received no comforting compensation to their above complaint, for the temple in Jerusalem is also still in ruins. And certainly neither the great king of Persia nor the later Roman Cæsar must be held responsible for its destruction. The ruins of Shushan and of Babylon have not contributed to its restoration. The causes for its downfall were not political, but spiritual.

The ideas which the Rabbis in their homilies entertain concerning the throne on which the king sat, though somewhat peculiar, are yet profound. For while the words, "when the king Ahhashverosh sat on the throne of his kingdom," express only figuratively the time in which the king returned to Shushan, the Jewish interpretation takes the figurative expression in its original literal meaning. The throne was the symbol of the royal power, and they connect their observation with its symbolic-phantastic (symbolisch-phantastisch) ornamentation. They do this in accordance with the Oriental usage and spirit.

The acquisition and the possession of a throne denotes in itself power, as well as the besieging and the removal of a throne denotes victory.¹ The transition of the universal monarchies from Babylon to Media, thence to Alexander, and thence to Rome, is represented by them as a transition of the throne. But what sort of a throne was this? No other but that of Solomon, as described in 1 Kings x. 18. For the throne of Israel which the Son of David establishes is spiritually the universal royal throne. He is represented in prophecy as ruling over all the nations of the earth (Ps. ii. 8, etc.).

But they embodied this truth in the type of political dominion. They likewise made Solomon to be a real universal king. Their historical insight appears to have been greater than it is generally admitted, in that they also ascribe universal dominion, i.e. preponderating power, to Egypt. For they say that the throne of Solomon came after his death into the hands of Shishak, king of Egypt, and then Asa recovered it when he conquered Serach the Cushite. They further assert that Nebuchadnezzar had it in his possession, and that Cyrus sat upon it. “I have seen,” says Elasar bar Yose, its fragments in Rome, but Ahhashverosh did not get it, for only a Kosmokrator (קָוְמוֹקָרְטוֹר) had a right to sit upon it.”

The application of this word is interesting. The Midrash applies it several times to great kings. It originated in Jewish speculative theology, hence in the Orphic hymn it is applied to heaven (Hymn 4. 3), but heaven shared it and other epithets with potentates of this world. It has been applied by the Church Fathers, after the example of the Apostle Paul,¹ to the tyranny of the princes of this world, to Satan, and to demons (comp. Du Cange, Gloss. Graec. p. 721).

But precisely because the only potentate of the world (קָנֵה שְׁמִים וְאַרְצָן) has alone the right to sit upon the throne, therefore the thrones which the tyrants of the world usurp are destroyed, and the Solomonic throne also is not restored, so long as the son of David does not take possession of it in spirit and in truth.

Ver. 3. “In the third year of his reign.”

It was in the second year after the death of Darius that Xerxes, as Herodotus reports (vii. 7), had put down the rebellion in Egypt, and so in the third year after his return, he convoked a council of the princes to learn their views, but chiefly to impart his own (Herod. vii. 8). The agreement of this narrative of Herodotus on a secondary point with the verse above, by itself indicates the identity of Xerxes with Ahhashverosh, although our book does not mention the conclusion of the war against Greece. For the historical matter of the Scripture, especially of the book of Esther, is concise and solid, aiming to come to the point, and presupposing the necessary limits of its report.

It does not tell of the Greek campaign,² because it was known, and also because its main aim was to derive the Israelitish history from things which were not considered of first-rate importance. It is satisfied to narrate that it was in the third year of Xerxes when the princes and the satraps assembled in the palace, in order to intimate thereby that a great political fact underlay the occurrence. For in order that what is told in the book of Esther should actually happen, there must be according to the purpose of God a special council of the great men of the State. There must be an important political motive, but this is of no consequence to the narrator. It was enough for him to record the general magnitude of the kingdom, because this only throws light upon the coming event. An ordinary banquet could not invest it with a psychological explanation. There was just one campaign to which all were gathered. The Scripture very often tells the events in Israel as apparently separate from the events in the world, and yet they flow through them like a river, which, in passing through a sea, does not mingle its waters, but becomes clearer and clearer, like the Rhine passing through the Lake of Constance. Yet the fine threads which connect the experience of Israel with the great powers of the world are to be found everywhere. We seem to hear in universal history a quiet sound, an echo of the future. Israel's history is not to be separated from the fall of Nineveh, Babylon, and Media. Our book also, instead of saying that there was once a great feast, when this and that happened, quietly but instructively reminds us of the great fact with which Xerxes was occupied at the time during which the sudden and unexpected intrigue was brooding, a fact which at once produced Israel's calamity and redemption. For the historian shows us both the external political condition and the internal party intrigues of the corrupt royal seraihs.

Just because the Midrash mostly uses Kosmokrator for earthly great kings is the homily (Wayikra Rabba, § 18, p. 160a) of interest, when it says: “When I made thee for a Kosmokrator, for a tyrant, over all men, I have nevertheless given thee no power over those who are called sons of God.” The note of Schenkel to Eph. vi. 12 is not correct.

“He made a feast unto all his princes and his servants.”

Herodotus, in reporting the council of war against the Greeks, did not need to tell what was a natural and common occurrence, that there had been a great feast provided for all the chiefs of the country. For his main object, according to his manner, was to illustrate the directions of the gods, and the dream through which the great event passed. But for the book of Esther, the feast was the great fundamental ground of its historical record. From the royal table issued the narrated catastrophe. A great feast was then in itself, as in modern times, nothing extraordinary in the Persian court. The feast "unto all the princes and servants" would not have a place in universal history, in spite of its being given to the generals and potentates of the universally famous Persian expedition against the Greeks. When it is mentioned here, it is not because of the persons that are enumerated, not for the sake of the guests, but for its own sake. With the significance of the men is joined the great war, which included the germs of a new universal culture; but with the fact of the feast is connected the domestic occasion out of which proceeded the local, but for Israel the worldwide, events about Esther and Haman. These "princes and servants" of the king are more closely called Parthemim (פרתמים), i.e. the first (fratama, Scr. prathama, comp. Benfey, p. 88), and princes of the provinces (districts, מִדְנִוָת). The Midrash has an interesting and instructive comment upon these princes, which certainly, on account of the corruption of the text¹ and the general neglect of scientific knowledge, has scarcely ever been considered.

The passage reads thus: "R. Eliezer says, Parthemim, these are two legions of the king, for no king is called Augustus until these two nominate him." And who are these? R. Isaak said they were the דָקּוֹמִיּוֹן וְאַנוֹסְטִיאָנִי, when these gave counsel to Nebuchadnezzar (Titus), and he marched to Jerusalem and destroyed the temple, then God destroyed them, and appointed others in their place; and these are, as R. Yehudah ben Shimon in the name of Eliezer says, י. בָּלְנִי וּבָרְקַרְאַנִי. The explanation of this passage, as given by Sachs (Beiträger zur Sprach- und Alterthumsforsch. i. 113), is a complete misunderstanding, because it is based upon a conjectural emendation of the text instead of upon observing the general thought. This is as follows: The Jewish commentators always proceed from the standpoint that the various experiences of the princes and the kingdoms of the world are to be explained from their relation to Israel. They thus considered, not only the history of Babylon, but also of Rome, which broke up the last remnants of parliamentary independence, destroyed Jerusalem and Bethel, and burned the temple. The aim of the contemporaries of the later Roman emperors was that the Roman Senate should only be an institution in appearance, and the real power to elect the imperators and to keep them on the throne should be vested in the army. To this the above comment refers. When Titus (who is to be understood under Nebuchadnezzar) destroyed Jerusalem, he did it—so is the tradition (which Benjamin of Tudela¹ could still speak of in the Middle Ages)—by special order of the Senate. For this the State was punished.

Hence comes its moral degradation. What the Parthemim were to Ahhashverosh,² that exactly were the דָקָמִינִי or rather the Decurions and אֲנוֹסְטִיאָנִי, viz. the Decurions and Augustani, in Rome.³ The Decurions were considered in the imperial provinces what the Senators were in Rome. By the term Augustani were understood those whom the Greek writers call Augystalioi, βασιλικοί, officers of the highest dignity.⁴

They want to say that before Titus the prominent men who appointed the emperor were the senators and consuls, but now they are the בלני, which stands for בלני, i.e. Calones,¹ and ברוקרייני, which stands for פרטורייני, i.e. Praetoriani. The reins of government passed from the hands of the senators into those of the life-guards. The cause of this is now ascribed to the evil counsel of the patricians against Jerusalem.

But the eyes of the Jewish teachers ought not to have been closed to the fact that the same could be said of the Jews themselves. They were right when they directed the attention of their people to the history of the nations for an explanation of the judgments of God. The experiences which the Roman Empire supply on this point are indeed many and awful, only they must not conceal from themselves the cause why they themselves lost their freedom and independence. Formerly they were masters, but now they are servants; once a nation, but now dispersed. Israel also was once a people of Parthemim—great and free in the doctrine and love of God—until they destroyed their “temple.”

Ver. 4. “When he showed the riches of his glorious kingdom.”

He proved the fulness of his royal power, in that he entertained the assembled princes for the space of a half-year, 180 days. But this feast is distinguished from the one mentioned in the 5th verse. The former was the council feast, instituted to deliberate about the great enterprise of the king.

It is repeatedly reported by the ancient writers that it was a custom with the Persians to hold consultations about war and other affairs (de apparatu bellorum et seriis rebus, Ammian. Marc.) during meals (Brisson, lib. ii. c. 131). These reports are to be understood to mean that their custom was not like ours, to carry on important business first and then to entertain, but they did both at the same time. The Midrash says (876) the king manifested his greatness by displaying before the guests the trophies of Jerusalem. So likewise Herodotus, for the glorification of his people, represents Mardonius and Xerxes as boasting of their hitherto achieved victories, in order to incite to the war against the Greeks (vii. 9). Clericus is of opinion that all the princes did not remain together during the 180 days of the feast, but that they took their turn, some left when new ones arrived. But this supposition is not necessary.

Ver. 5. "And when these days were fulfilled, the king made a feast unto all the people that were present in Shushan."¹

It lasted seven days, and was held in the garden of the palace. After the feastings and the consultations of the princes, at which the king displayed his whole power which he put in motion against the Greeks, there followed a feast specially for the people, which lasted a week.² There is a passage in the Schahnameh of Firdussi giving also an account of a feast lasting seven days, and according to the old Oriental custom it is held in the delightful groves of a park. Then follows the description, as by the epic poet, of the splendour that was there. There were curtains of white (חוֹר) and of blue (חַכְלָת) karpas, which originally in Sanscr. Karpasa meant cotton, but afterwards fine linen also.¹

It has been observed² that Curtius (iii. 3. 19) describes the cap of the Persian kings as having a white and blue stripe. But the same author says afterwards (vi. 6. 4) that the head-dress had white and purple stripes. Perhaps he is correct in both passages. White and blue are the colours of the atmosphere and of the sky (caeruleus).³ These curtains (aulaea, vela) were furnished with cords of בָּזֶן (fine linen) and purple, suspended on silver poles, and tied to marble pillars. It is described that what was then considered as the most costly material was used in the decoration of the garden tents. To this class belonged byssus and purple. Many names of the ancient materials described also their colours. Cords of byssus are white. A Jewish teacher remarks in the Midrash that freemen fasten their garments with cords of byssus (c. 88).

That white was in many cases the sign of liberty is well known. Khalid, the Arab, ordered the Taghlebites to wear a black band as a mark of their dependence. Though colours as marks of party distinction are no longer in vogue to the same extent as of old, yet even to-day white is among Mohammedans the mark of the masters of the country (comp. my "Geschichte der Juden," in Ersch und Gruber, ii. 27, p. 236). the book of Esther. The silver poles stand opposite the marble pillars. The former (כָּלִילִי) are movable, the latter are fixed. Both are white; for not only כְּסֶף, silver, has its name from the colour of white, but also שֵׁשׁ is white marble, and likewise Egyptian byssus was called so on account of its whiteness. The great residence in which the feast took place was named Shushan, from the white lilies which were cultivated in the garden. The floor was a mosaic pavement of בַּהַט (from which came alabaster, alabastrum, Goth. Alabalastrum, probably with the article אֲלַחַת or אַלְחַת, to be known among the Greeks and Romans), of שֵׁשׁ, like the pillars of דָּר and סָהָרָת.

These two words, as well as בַּהַט, occur only once here. דָּר is taken, since Bochart, to be pearl; yet the objection of Gesenius, that the language used here can only refer to stone, has its weight, and therefore it must mean mother-of-pearl, or pearl-stone, as the LXX. translates. סָהָרָת, according to Fürst, should be read סָקָרָת, from the Chald. סָקָר. If so, it must be taken for red marble, which was very much used.¹ This explanation is to be preferred, because thus we see the same mingling of colour, white and red, for the floor as for the cords of the tent. Upon this floor stood gold and silver chairs and tables.

The description given here is so little exaggerated, that even Mardonius had similar magnificence in his camp. The Greeks found after their victory “tents decorated with gold and silver, couches wrought in silver and gold, and other precious things” (Herod. ix. 80). Xerxes had left his own tent to Mardonius, and Pausanias was amazed at the sight of the golden and silver beds and tables, etc. (ix. 82). It is interesting to observe that the gloss of the Greek translation read, instead of וְדָר וְסָהָרָת,² and therefore translated

Where flowers gaily shone in perfumed posies ;

The whole description of ver. 6 begins with the word חור. In the Masoretic text the letter ה is longer than usual; but it would be in vain to try to find a reason for the custom of Bible copyists of making some letters more prominent (see my note on Ruth, p. 225), and such peculiarities in the old and well-preserved manuscripts can sometimes only be explained from the casual notes of the copyists.

Ver. 7. וְהַשְׁקָוֹת בְּכָל וְהַב—“And they gave them drink in vessels of gold, the vessels being diverse one from another.”

Xenophon says of the Persians, that they were proud of possessing a large number of drinking vessels (Cyrop. viii. 8. 18; comp. Athenaeus, lib. xi. p. 465). Accordingly, there were many changes of cups at a royal entertainment in order to display the abundance of possession; and so it is the custom even now at the festive entertainment of great people.

וְיִין מֶלֶכְוֹת רַב—“And the wine of the kingdom was in abundance, according to the bounty or hand (כיד) of the king, as the great king is.”

There could be no thought of insufficiency. The expression יין מלכויות ר' “the wine of the kingdom,” is striking, for it proves also how the king entertained his guests. יין המלך would be wine of the king; יין המלכויות is royal wine, i.e. such as the king himself used. It was not distinguished merely for quantity, but for quality—the best wine, such as befits the feasts of kings. The king himself drank only Syrian (chalybonic) wine (comp. Brisson, i. c. 84). May we not direct our attention to another table, at which also a king sat? This was in Cana of Galilee. There the wine was insufficient for all the invited guests until the mercy of their Friend supplied them with the royal wine of the first miracle, and turned the old drink into taste of the joy of the new faith. What Ahhashverosh gave for the purpose of intoxication, this King gave for sober reflection upon the grace of God.

Ver. 8. וְהַשְׁתִּיה כֵּدֶת אֵין אָנוֹם—“And the drinking was according to the law, none could compel.”

The king had strictly commanded every steward to let every man do as he liked in this matter. This order was not for the purpose of teaching the people to be temperate in drink, but rather to enhance their pleasure by leaving them to please themselves without any restraint. The sense of the passage is that it was the custom at court that, in spite of the wine being so costly, the courtiers were to see that every one should have as much of it as he liked to drink.¹ For such large drinking companies all restrictions ceased. Every one was to feel at home. The Roman custom to nominate kings of the table and modimperatores (comp. Ursinus, de Tricliniis Roman. p. 383, etc.) has no parallel here. The Persians were great drinkers. “They drink so much,” says Xenophon, “that they cannot stand upright upon their feet, and must be carried out.” Every occasion was used by them to get drunk. When Themistocles fled to the King of Persia,

the latter embraced the opportunity of making a drinking feast (Plut. Themistocle. 28). Firdussi of the Mohammedan time faithfully represents this ancient custom. When the hero was about to march to the war, we read (p. 151), “Then music resounded, the cups were filled with wine, and the shah was merry at the feast.” Rustem describes it thus (p. 481),—

“The cups were handed round to every head,
And cheeks of guests have grown, like spring flowers, red.”

When Kai Chosru gave a feast (p. 511),—

“All heroes deep in lust have sunk,
And reel from out the palace drunk.”¹

In this revelry in the palace of the garden at Shushan every one could share; but, says the Mishna, Mordecai and his like-minded companions had no part in it. For the pious, who adore their God, and are penitent as long as they are in exile, such feasts are unsuitable.

Ver. 9. נִמְוָשְׁתִּי הַמֶּלֶךְ—“Also Vashti the queen made a feast for the women in the royal house.”

It was not unusual for the royal women of the East to hold feasts in their apartments for the court ladies. This we are told by Firdussi of the Princess Menishe, that she had an annual spring-feast with her ladies; and likewise Sudabe, the wife of the shah, invited her stepson Sijawush to a female feast (p. 389),—

“The music rang, and foamed the sparkling wine,
The minstrels diamond decked in glittering line, Loud sang.”

Chardin remarks: “In Persia as well as in the whole

Orient, the women used to celebrate feasts at the same time with the men, but separate" (comp. Rosenmüller, Morgenland, note 705).

It might appear that the mentioning of the women's feast is unessential to the narrative, inasmuch as the catastrophe proceeded from the revelry of the men, but not of the women. But the notice introduces first the queen in the history, to make known that she was the legitimate queen, because she occupied in the royal house the same position with regard to the women as Ahhashverosh did with regard to the men. We also learn from this that Vashti was equally hilarious at her feast as her husband was at his. The Jewish teachers refer to this in their homilies, when they blame her equally with her husband as a seducer to luxury and vice, so that the women of Israel, too, caught the infection. They apply to Vashti Isa. iii. 12, "As for my people, children are their oppressors, and women rule over them." There were such four wicked women in the world, Jezebel and Athaliah in Israel, and Semiramis and Vashti among the nations (M. Esther 89b).

The name Vashti undoubtedly means in Old Persian, "beautiful woman," and is either an epithet, or stands for the proper name (η Καλλώ). The LXX. reproduces it by 'Αστίν. In Aeschylus occurs the name Astaspes (Pers. 22).

Ver. 10. —בַּיּוֹם הַשְׁבִיעִי — "On the seventh day, when the heart of the king was merry with wine," etc.

Eunuchs were always in the monarchies of the Asiatic Orient the most influential courtiers. The chief officer of the army (2 Kings xxv. 19), the chief butler and chief baker (Gen. xl. 2), as well as the chief treasurers, chief guards of the harem, and chamberlains, סרסים, i.e. spadones, were chosen from this class. Hammer observes (Gesch. des osman. Reichs, v. 360) that down to modern times, with the exception of the chamberlain, the other court officers were eunuchs. Their names, he says, are usually in the East borrowed from flowers and perfumes (such as hyacinth, tulip, narcissus, musk, amber, camphor); but as regards the names of the officers mentioned in ver. 10, the supposition is not perhaps without ground that they denote official designations. We are therefore in a position the more easily to explain them by introducing the Syro-Chaldaic element, because the Medo-Persian kingdom has surely in this but entered upon the inheritance of the great power of Babylon. Consequently we have in the Syriac מְהִימָן, meaning faithful, reliable,¹ a qualification which was considered necessary, particularly to eunuchs.

The Syriac translator therefore renders in several passages the word סְרִים simply by mehiman (see 1 Kings xxii. 9; 2 Kings ix. 32). The first-mentioned in our passage was either the chief officer of all, or a cabinet minister. The second is בּוֹזֶתֶא, biztha, meaning the treasurer, from בּוֹזֶת or בּוֹזֶה, which signifies prey, substance, riches (comp. Dan. xi. 24). חַרְבָּוֹנָה, hharbona, the chief of the bodyguard, from חַרְבָּה, harb, “a sword.” In בּוֹנְחָא, abagtha, must be understood the office which the Turkish court designates by kislarga, i.e. the guard of the harem, for which office eunuchs were specially suitable. For the explanation of the word, it may be useful to draw attention to the oft-repeated assertion of ancient writers, that βαγῶς or βαγῶας is the Persian word for eunuch. But, on the other hand, it is not improbable that אֲבָנָחָא and זֵתָר, zethar, signify the chief baker and the chief butler. The first comes from בְּנָה, bread, food (Sanscr. bhag, cf. βέκος, φάγειν), the second from שְׁתָר = זֵתָר, from שְׁתָה, to drink. The last name, כְּרָכָא כְּרָךְ, kerca kerch, which means in Syriac “a castle” or “fort,” and represents the Kapuaga or chief commander of the castle or tower.

That we have to do here with officials and not merely

with accidentally mentioned names, appears from the added clause : "The seven sarism (eunuchs) that ministered in the presence of Ahhashverosh the king." It becomes thus intelligible why these seven men received the order to fetch Vashti. Royal etiquette required that she should be accompanied by the greatest dignitaries of the State to the dining-room of the king.

The king was inebriated when he issued this order. It was not the custom among the Persians that the wives of kings should take part in such general drinking feasts. This appears from the fact that Vashti had a separate feast for the women. To this effect is what Plutarch tells us (Sypos. i. 1), which is repeated by others, "that the Persians never play and dance with their wives, but with their concubines." In Firdussi's poems, which are true pictures of ancient customs, it is not mentioned that the wife of the shah, but that the female singers and slaves, were present at the intoxicating festivities. True, in the well-known passage in Herod. v. 18, the Persians say to the Macedonians, "With us in Persia, it is the custom to prepare a great feast, to which also the concubines and the housewives, κουριδίας γυναικες, are invited ;" but they appear thereby, for the sake of their pleasures, to have expressed themselves in equivocal terms. Had it been the usual custom, Vashti would have taken part in the preceding feast of 180 days, and her appearance would not have had to be postponed till the seventh day of the feast for men. The unusualness of the custom, moreover, appears from what we are told, that Ahhashverosh wanted to show the great men of the country her beauty, as they had never seen her. For Plutarch's report (Themist. 26) as well as Justin's (41. 3), that even the faces of the wives and concubines were not seen by strangers, is true with some exceptions. But the king being drunk, and conscious of his might, thought himself above feelings of jealousy and of the petty customs, and ordered Vashti to come.

Ver. 12. וְהִתְמַאֵן הַמֶּלֶכה—“But the queen refused.”

Plutarch says (to the ill-instructed Prince Anf.): “The Persian king held all for slaves, with the exception of his wife, over whom especially he ought to have exercised his authority.” Now, just because she enjoyed extra liberty, she refused to come, for she wanted to show the other concubines the power of her charms. The Midrash (90a) explains the refusal in its own peculiar fashion. According to it, Ahhashverosh was a usurper of the throne, and Vashti was the granddaughter of Nebuchadnezzar, and therefore the legitimate heir to the throne. She sent to him this message: “When thou wast groom in my father’s stable, thou wast accustomed to fetch prostitutes, and dost thou regard me as one of them ?” It is noteworthy that the word she is said to apply to him is אַסְטָבָלָאָטִי, Komīs, Comes stabulatus, i.e. the Comes stabuli, Comestabilis, Conestabilis, from which the great office of the French Connétable has its origin. (By the Byzantines Κοντοσταῦλος.) The queen refuses to come at the king’s commandment by the chamberlain. If he had come himself to fetch her, she would have readily gone; but excited as she was, like himself, through much wine, and conscious of her beauty, she asserted her self-respect. She dared to say no to the messengers, and they in their turn did not bring to the king this refusal in a mild form.

“Therefore was the king very wroth.”

No good ever comes from pride aroused by drunkenness. Herodotus narrates the story, according to which Kandaules, king of Lydia, had boasted of the beauty of his wife, and this was the cause of his losing his life. The Persians who came to Amyntas of Macedonia were so greedy after intoxicating drinks and things of extravagance, that the embittered inhabitants killed them. In the case above, the king considered himself greatly insulted, because his will was not obeyed in the presence of his princes and courtiers. His dreadful anger was excited, and the only person who could appease it, Vashti herself, was too proud and stubborn to come.¹

Ver. 13. “Then the king spake to the wise men, which knew the times.”

The affair did not end with the king’s becoming sober. The ancient writers often remark, that the transactions which used to take place during the time of inebriation were resumed after the people got sober (Brisson, ii. 131). This circumstance is instructive, as it shows the power of small things at the great royal court. The etiquette of royalty is, especially in the East, the type of authority, and the only restraining influence to which the king himself is subject. Vanity and consciousness of power have sometimes also in Christian States given rise to high political questions, because of non-observance of proper etiquette towards the sovereign. The king, indeed, should not have allowed that the queen should be fetched by main force; but whether it was possible that any one should disobey his will was a question for the highest council of the kingdom to hear and to determine. The ידע עתים יְדֹעַ הָעֵתִים are the Magi, as they are so called, not on account of their superstition (as Clericus thinks), but because they are experienced, such as know what is proper under the circumstances; they correspond to those whom we designate as worldly wise, or savants. They are acquainted with the times and customs, are the judges concerning ceremonies and ordinances (רְחֵב וּדְיִזְמָנִים) in the land. It is intentionally mentioned how seriously the king took the matter in hand.

In spite of the great affairs of the kingdom which occupied his mind, the apparently insignificant incident which resulted from drunkenness he could not let pass without discussing it like one of the most difficult State questions. In a kingdom such as was that of the great Persian king, nothing was insignificant. Everything that concerned his person was important. He proposed the matter before the cabinet council with all the judicial formalities, as in cases of greater concern he was accustomed to consult those who were versed in the ordinances and laws of justice (comp. Herod. iii. 31).

Ver. 14. והקרב אליו—“The ministers before whom he proposed the matter were standing next unto him.”

They that sat near him in the cabinet, who saw the face of the king, were the seven princes of Persia and Media. A matter which concerned the persons of the king and of the queen could only be discussed by the highest tribunal. It is known that Herodotus tells of the seven tribal chiefs of Persia, that they always enjoyed free access to the king.

Darius belonged to the order of these seven chiefs, and when he became king another succeeded to his place. For the king was the head of all, and was surrounded by seven princes, as the seven (at the time known) stars¹ surround the sun. Hence the number seven appears in all the State institutions of the Persians. To Ezra the order was issued from the king and his seven privy councillors. Aeschylus mentions seven highest officials as standing nearest to the king. Firdussi could still report of seven heroes surrounding the shah.² Therefore the names which are mentioned do not, as the Midrash says, signify offices, but are names of the great officers who surrounded Xerxes, of the highest dignitaries, statesmen, and generals who administered the affairs of the State, and accompanied him in his campaigns.

It is worthy of remark that the names here mentioned appear again in the well-known Persian histories. And it is also of great interest and importance to the testimony of the truth of this book, to find that Herodotus reproduces the names in the Greek form of writing. The narrative receives special vividness when we find at the court of justice the same persons of whom Herodotus, on account of their military participation in the Persian war, gives us more full information. One caution is here necessary. The two texts of the names must not be compared for the purpose of correcting each other ; they both agree, but their variations are due to the different pronunciation of the names by the Greeks and by the local Jews. Moreover, great stress must not be put on the Masoretic punctuation, which was the work of centuries in which the Jews had forgotten the pronunciation of these names. In order to proceed securely in this attempt of identification, we begin with the sixth name, with מִרְסָנָא, Marsena. One can recognise in him Mardonius the son of Gobryas, the inciter of the war. There can be no doubt about the person of מַרְסָם. Herodotus says (vii. 62) that all Medes (and Persians) were called Arians. Hence the prefix Ario, which occurs in the name Ari, is often only a family name and not a proper one. The above מַרְסָם is the Mardos of Herodotus, where the son of Darius and Parmys, a prominent man, the maternal grandson of Cyrus (vii. 79), is therefore also called by the Greeks Ariomardos. In the same manner we learn to know בָּרְשָׁנָא, Carshena, but which was originally read בָּרְשָׁנָה, as the name Barzanes (cited by Diodorus and Arrian as of a king of Armenia, but with the spelling of Barzaentes). Ariobarzanes is also the name of the Persian satrap (comp. Xenophon, Cyrop. viii. 8. 4, and the annotation of Schneider). Here is meant Artabazanes, —for Arta (Herod. vii. 61), like Ario, is to be understood as denoting nobility of pedigree,—who was an elder brother of Xerxes (vii. 2). Just so is שֵׁתֶר, Shehtar, easily to be recognised in the strongly aspirated name of Hydarnes. One of the seven who subdued Pseudo-Smerdis bore this name (Herod. iii. 70), and his son Hydarnes was the leader of the “memorable ten thousand” in the Persian war (vii. 84). Upon the cuneiform inscriptions the interpreters read the name Vidarna as also they read Uwaihi and Kabujia for the so-called Susia and Cambyses. According to similar vocal laws, the writing of אַדְמָתָה, Admetha, in Esther, corresponds to Aspathines. The transition of the Greek p, b into the Hebrew ט is well known. Achmetha, אַחְמָתָה, is Ecbathana. So is Smerdis called in cuneiform inscriptions Bartya. Aspathines also was one of the seven from whom Darius rose to be king. The two names of תְּרִשְׁׁישׁ and מְמוֹן, Tarshish and Memucan, offer greater philosophical difficulties, but their solution can with probability be effected if the easy changes in the forms are taken into consideration.

Tarshish has indeed a resemblance in sound to the office-bearer called Tirshata, the name Theresh, and occurs in cuneiform in the name of an Armenian general of Darius, which is read Darshi (sh). The pointing of the Masoretes is easily explained from the fact that the name of Tarshish was too familiar to them, as standing in the Bible for a certain country and for a maritime power. But one must finally read תְּרִשְׁׁישׁ for בְּרִשְׁׁישׁ, from which the Greek name Prexaspes easily appears. This is evident from the circumstance of his position among the seven, for he stands near Admetha, whose son Asthapius was a naval captain (Herod. vii. 97). The Greek χ for the ש we have already found in the name of Xerxes. It remains yet to speak of the name מְמוֹן. The מ has certainly been introduced by the vocalization of the Masora. But for מְמָן should be read מְכָנָן (comp. Vidafrana and Intaphemes), or rather חְכָנָן, so that through the interchange of כ with ב the double consonant כ was changed for a double ט. The name of Ahhaemenes in the cuneiform: Hakhamanish is to be recognised in this. This was the original ancestor of a Persian family, and of a brother and general of Xerxes. This explanation of the names receives its support from the positions in which they stand. First, the elder brother of Xerxes, then the two old and former friends of Darius (Hydarnes and Aspathines), then two younger tribal chiefs, and two younger brothers of Xerxes. The question why were just these chosen, and why are Otanes and his son Smerdomenes left out, is answered, because the cabinet consisted only of seven, and those who were entitled to cabinet rank were probably not appointed at the same time, but as a vacancy occurred ; and this was either by special choice of the king, or by other arrangements. Otanes was perhaps not chosen, for the reason that his daughter was the wife of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 61).

Ver. 15. “ What shall we do unto the queen Vashti according to law ? ”

This formal question was put to the seven princes, and it varies from the question put before the council by Xerxes, whether we should undertake the war with Greece or not, in this respect, that the latter was mainly pleaded by Mardonius and was opposed by Artaban ; but the former, although one only pronounced the decision, was in fact agreed to by all.

The description of the whole transaction is a most valuable representation of ancient court history. Not only does it teach that there were not wanting good old forms which the king was obliged to use when he desired to place important measures before the council of princes ; but it also shows how these forms had lost their intrinsic value when the men and the times had no longer the spirit to animate them. Of what avail are prescribed statutes when there is no heart to beat in them ? A council which is incompetent to refuse to entertain the question whether the queen was right or not in refusing to come to the revelry of her husband already manifests a dependent spirit, which disqualifies it from pronouncing an impartial judgment. But they do not refer the question back to the king, because the behaviour of the queen gives them the opportunity of intriguing. A spirit of jealousy has always existed in Oriental countries between persons and corporations, who exercised an influence upon the king. Thus far Ahhashverosh appears to have been led by his wife. Therefore the momentary anger which she excited in him was eagerly grasped by them as an occasion for destroying her influence. It was so, too, according to the beautiful story which Firdussi communicates, when Sudabe's intrigues with the king failed, no one rose up in the council to speak for her,—

“The princes brought their homage,
And shouted : Death disgraceful
Be the punishment to the shameful.”

The instructive stories of the Forty Viziers, properly speaking, contain nothing else but the struggle between the queen and the royal councillors as to predominance of their respective influences upon the decision of the king. The same happens in all countries, but especially in the East; also in recent times.¹ Hammer is of opinion that in the empire of the Osmans, since the time of Soliman the Fair, the influence of the wives was more often directed against the grand vizier. Something of the same kind took place here; no voice was raised either to defend or to excuse her. The king had placed the sentence in the hands of her enemies, or, at least, of her timid judges. If any wished to defend her, he was deterred by the thought that he would arouse the suspicion of holding doubtful views as to the irrevocable character of the sovereignty of the king. Herodotus gives a fair example of the caution practised by a timidly prudent court of justice which Cambyses convoked, in order to decide the question whether he might marry his sister (iii. 31). The judges found it difficult to say yes or no, but they perceived that he wanted an affirmative answer, and that he would consider a negative one as an insult upon his right to do as he liked, so they decided that, "Whereas they did not know of any law which allowed such a marriage, on the other hand they knew well that the king was allowed to act as he pleases." Here also it was not entirely without danger to appear as a decided opponent of the queen. The great affection which the king had for her might eventually cause her conduct to appear before him in a different aspect, which would excuse her and be dangerous to the opponent. Memucan (Ahhaemenes) implies this in his speech. He lays emphasis upon the principle involved in the act of Vashti, and makes it, to a certain degree, as a social matter which concerns the State. The king has in this affair not only to consider his own interests, but also the interests of all his subjects. For the queen has not only sinned against him, but by her example she has also excited the whole country. What Vashti had dared to do will be known everywhere; and if this deed is to remain unpunished, then will the rights of the husbands be disregarded all over the country. The wives will refer to the example of Vashti, and repudiate the authority of their husbands, so that בזין, great contempt, and קצף, anger, will enter to disturb the family peace.¹ Memucan makes his assault upon the queen in a Machiavelian manner. With great subtlety he tries to conceal this under the pretence of wishing the welfare of the people, which he knows the king has at heart. He gives to the accusation such a turn of apparent impartiality, as to make it difficult for the king, especially after the affair became known abroad, to yield to the queen. And there was none on the council ¹According to Mohammedan custom, a woman must appear at the call of her husband, and render obedience and subjection to him, "even should both her hands be occupied at the time with kneading bread . . . as the messenger of God had said (peace be upon him). 'And if it were permitted to prostrate oneself before any one but God, I should command the wives to prostrate themselves before their husbands'" (comp. Vierzig Veziere, ed. Behrnauer, c. vii. p. 95).

board who had the courage to expose the deceitful machinations of Memucan. For it could have been proved that the queen by not coming to the banquet was more obedient to her royal spouse than if she had come.

But these moral maxims had no place in the heart of any one, perhaps not even in the heart of Vashti herself. It could again have been proved that the power of woman is neither founded nor abrogated by law. It was also certainly known to those who sat together, that Vashti's conduct was neither unheard of, nor that it would result in any extraordinary occurrence. Moreover, they knew that the exemplary punishment of Vashti would not at all alter the influence of the beauty and amiability of women over those upon whom they exercise the power of their attractions even in bad things, where the will is not powerful enough to offer resistance. Indeed, it is in allusion to Persian manners that the First Book of Esdras speaks of the highest and greatest power which Zerubbabel ascribes to wives and their husbands. He says (chap. iv. 28) : " Is not the king great in his power ? do not all regions fear to touch him ? Yet did I see him and Apame the king's concubine, the daughter of the admirable Bartacus, sitting at the right hand of the king, and taking the crown from the king's head, and setting it upon her own head ; she also struck the king with her left hand . . . O ye men, how can it be but that women should be strong, seeing they do thus ? "

Ver. 19. אֲשֶׁר לَا תָבֹא וְשִׁתְיִ—"That Vashti come no more," etc.

That tyranny, which does not know even the fear of God, is the greatest folly, our narrative teaches with unsurpassable clearness and simplicity. Excessive vanity demented the king more than the wine did. It lasted longer than his wrath. He neither could see that the doing of Vashti was caused by his own fault, nor the nature of the intrigues against her whom he still loved. In his state of excitement he had not the sagacity either to palliate her offence or to detect the snare which was laid against him by his sycophants. The Midrash, in reference to this, rightly calls him a טפש—fool. Memucan's impudent accusation has for its aim to remove Vashti from the royal palace, and to give her throne to another that is better than she. From the expression לְעוֹתָה הַטוּבָה מִמֶּנָּה it must not be supposed that Vashti was not the queen, but one of the women of the harem, who, on account of her beauty, had raised herself to such an influential position. For although it is said that her throne should be given to her companion, another inmate of the harem, who is better, טוּבָה, i.e. more tractable, obliging, and submissive, yet we must remember that this is the language of contempt, in which the vile courtier tries to wreak his private vengeance. Such examples of queens having to quit their thrones to make room for new beauties are not only found in Oriental, but also in European, particularly in modern French histories. But it must be also observed that the autocrat of the ancient great empire apparently asserted his capricious will in a legal manner, whereas the modern sultans, in their arbitrary acts, have even thrown off the external forms of legality. Chardin relates that one of the favourite wives of the shah had once besought him not to touch her on a certain day on account of her bodily condition, which made it necessary that she should have rest. The shah caused her to be examined, and when it was found that her plea had no foundation in fact, she was at once burned alive (Voyages, vi. 229).

Queen Vashti would not have succumbed if the royal privy councillor had not voted against her. But he used the opportunity to destroy the female influence at court. The same attempt, only in a coarser manner, was made by the viziers to avert the harem influence from the Sultan of the Osmans, Ahmed I., at the beginning of the seventeenth century. They told him that these women were witches, and had bewitched his father Soliman, so that he was entirely dependent upon them. Memucan's accusation went deeper, was more refined and flattering to the vanity of the king, inasmuch as it made the affair of Vashti's disobedience a question of principle. It was represented to him that his own position was at stake in the matter. If he yielded to her, he would be the cause of the disobedience of all the women in the country, and something dreadful might happen. But, on the other hand, it was his bounden duty, as he had the supreme power, to issue a decree that the wives must everywhere pay implicit obedience to their husbands.

Ver. 20. וַיְשִׁמְעַ פָּנָם הַמֶּלֶךְ—“And when the king's decree which he shall make shall be published.”

Although Memucan's aim was to have Vashti deposed, yet he laid special stress upon this. He propounded a general principle, that disobedience of wives to their husbands was dangerous to the peace of the State. He made it appear that Vashti's deposition must be the natural outcome of this principle, rather than the aim of his advice. Should she even escape unhurt from this ordeal, such a decree, when publicly proclaimed under the sanction of royal prerogative and authority, would, at any rate, have a deterrent effect upon the women of the country. He therefore changed the dangerous and disagreeable negative verdict concerning Vashti into a positive royal decree, which should affect the women of the country generally. By this subtle device the king was entrapped into an implicit pledge of removing the queen. His own decree precluded him from saving Vashti, which would have been of direful life-long consequence to his councillors. Through the publication of a royal פָּנָם, official document, a reconciliation of the king with his former favourite became extremely difficult, and the intrigue which probably began already at the feast received thereby its crowning victory.

To our ideas it appears almost comical, that a king should send out a circular in which the women are commanded to render due honour to their husbands.¹ But it did not appear in this light to the ancient Persians.

¹ That this is in harmony with the Oriental mind may be seen in the story of The Thousand and One Nights (xxiv. 68), where it is told that a

The power of the great Persian king over his subjects was really universal.¹ In fact, there was not a domestic or family right in which he could not interfere. This is evident from the ideal glorification in which Xenophon represents the institutions of Cyrus when developing their application. He says that the Persian laws precluded beforehand the possibility of the citizen thinking of evil (Cyrop. i. 2). Again he reports that Cyrus had forbidden to spit or to sneeze, or even to turn round in public places, as something to be admired (Cyrop. viii. 1. 42). The companions of Cyrus cannot go hunting if Astyages does not command their fathers (Cyrop. i. 4). And, indeed, this was yet copied by the Sultan of the Osmans in 1664, who ordered to give his kiaja 100 switches upon the soles of his feet because he hunted of his own accord (Hammer, vi. 148). The decree which the king, on the proposal of Memucan, issued, had not to do with the accomplishment of an actual duty, but with the subjection of the disposition of man to a command. Civil right was not taken from the women, but obedience was enjoined upon them. The husbands did not receive a substantial, but only an ideal privilege. But just for this reason, the subtle plan pleased the adulated vanity of the conceited king. He undertook to accomplish that which could be done by no one. Had it been possible by the application of external special force to restore order among the husbands in the house, it would have been done long ago.

The Persian king must have known from his own history and from that of his family how little the greatest force could prevent one becoming subject to the humour of one's beloved in the house. But being dazzled by his fancied and overrated omnipotence, he adopted this proposal as a means whereby sultan ordered to proclaim everywhere : "It is not proper that any one should follow the advice of women."

to assert his power, and to make everybody feel the terror of his autocratic rule. It is certainly no fable which is told of Xerxes, viz. that when the inundation of the Hellespont had destroyed his bridges, he gave order that it should be bastinaded for disobedience (Herod. vii. 35). But it was more easy for him to beat the sea than to obtain that which his edict commanded, namely, to cause the women to renounce their desire of governing by their own peculiar powers. Only the truth is mightier than the women (as Zerubbabel says); and it alone could keep their power within bounds and hallow them. Even the command of the servant of the King of kings, of the Apostle Paul, that women should not speak in the churches, could not exert a compulsory force upon them. Though it is apparently externally obeyed, yet it is only externally so.

Ver. 21. "And the saying pleased the king."

The proposal of Memucan was readily sanctioned by him.¹ No one among the ministers offered opposition. Vashti lost her influence, probably also her life, although this is not expressly mentioned; but only that she should not come to the king, and that her royalty (מלוכה) should be given to another. In the empire of the Osmans also, each Chasseki, i.e. female favourite, had her court, her chamberlain (kiaja), the income of a Sandjak, and a gilded equipage, set with precious stones (Hammer, v. 329). But if she had been deprived of all this, and her life had been spared, she was still to be feared by her enemies; therefore they must have insisted that she should be quickly executed. The enjoyment of the momentary favour of a tyrant has often enough ended sadly. Vashti fell in a war which is frequently carried on in Eastern courts between the women and the eunuchs and the princes.² That her fall

² Concerning the penalties which are meted out to the favourites when they have displeased the sultan, Chardin writes (Voyages, vi. 233): "Car did not lead to serious disasters after the king had sobered down and calmly reflected upon it, was owing to the fact that he undertook a great campaign, which occupied all his attention.

Ver. 22. “And he sent letters into all the king’s provinces, into every province according to the writing thereof, and to every people after their language.”

It is here emphatically declared that the decree addressed to all the peoples was written both in the distinctive language, לְשׁוֹן, and in the distinctive alphabet, בָּתָבָח, of each nation. We learn from this that the Persian Government did not use a particular official language in its proceedings with the people, but addressed them in their own dialects (comp. c. viii. 9). The contents of this decree were, That every man should be lord, שָׁרֵךְ, in his house, and should command, וּמְרַבֵּר, in his language. Hence the decree was to be in force not only in Persia, but everywhere, and valid not merely in Persian language, but in every language.

The Midrash makes a peculiar remark upon this. The decree was written in four principal languages. (1) יוונית, Greek (as Hellenic was considered the same as Heathenism. The Talmud says: “Cursed be the man who shall teach his son the wisdom of the Greeks” (Sotah, p. 49b), comp. my Mag. Alterth. pp. 196 and 338), for the purpose of singing; (2) in Persian, for lamentation; (3) in Hebrew, for holding intercourse with one another; (4) in Latin, the language which is suitable for carrying on war. History has taught, that in all languages, more especially in Hebrew, the voice of lamentation resounded. One might almost say that Hebrew literature has ceased to le Roi . . . en dégrade les unes, changeant ces Favorites en esclaves, qu’on en voie servir aux plus bas emplois et dans les quartiers reculez du Serail ; il en fait châtier d’autres à coups de verge et de bâton, il en fait tuer, il en fait même brûler les unes et enterrer les autres toutes vives.” According to the story of The Thousand and One Nights (xiii. 16), Harun Arrashid had a dark tower in which the favourites were imprisoned when they committed an offence.

exist, since in modern times the Jews think that they need no longer mourn. (M. Esther, p. 91a.)

The author of the verdict under which Vashti fell was Memucan, the last mentioned among the privy councillors. The Midrash tries to find out the personal motives which led him to entertain such hostile feelings against Vashti. One was, that on a certain occasion she had struck his face with a slipper. Such disgraceful treatment is certainly no rare occurrence in the East.¹

The second was, because his wife had not been invited by the queen to the feast.

The third was, because he wanted to see his own daughter promoted in the place of Vashti. Whether the reasons given by the Midrash were exactly the same which actuated the hatred of Memucan or not, one thing is certain, that he could not tolerate the petticoat government of Vashti, and that such and similar reasons as are given by the Rabbis have often led to such results.

That Herodotus does not mention this event is not to be wondered at, inasmuch as it happened before the campaign. Apart from this, it is not to be expected that he should have known everything which took place in the inner circle of the Persian court, and that he should have incorporated this in his brief reports of the Persian war. There were many writings and administrative measures issued from Shushan, and these were of such a character as to be deposited by all the governors among the acts of administration.²

² In Athenaeus, lib. xiii. p. 556, we read: "Among the Persians, the queen must tolerate many concubines, because the king, like a master, has the command over his wife." διὰ τὸ ὡς δεσπότην ἔρχεται τῆς γυμνετῆς τὸν βασιλία.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1. אַחֲר הַדְבָּרִים הַאֵלֶּה—“After these things, when the wrath of the king Ahhashverosh was pacified, he remembered Vashti.”¹

This did not happen soon after the feast named in chap. i., but there was an anxious interval between. We see here how exactly even the chronology of our book shows that Xerxes and Ahhashverosh are identical. In the third year of his reign the above event took place, and in the seventh (comp. ver. 16) this which is told here. In this year Xerxes returned from his campaign (480–479), and therefore only now could the thread of the court history of Shushan be resumed (ver. 16). After the exhaustive fatigues which he went through in that war, he felt the want of the companionship of Vashti, whom he had really once affectionately loved. Formerly the ambitious desire for war and conquest had eclipsed the feelings of love to the women. Now they arose the more strongly, as in the enjoyment of a specially agreeable favourite he might forget many a care. When we read, “he remembered Vashti, and what was decreed against her,” still now after three years we may suppose that he somehow connected the misfortunes of his campaign with the wrath and the severity with which he had treated her.

When Xerxes gave expression to such thoughts, what would not his courtiers have given if they could have brought Vashti to life ! But there was no one present to do like the vizier of the story of the Forty Viziers (ed. Behrnauer, p. 141), where it is told,—A king had once in his drunken hours pronounced a sentence of death against his favourite friend, but the vizier did not execute the order, but hid the culprit. When the king became sober, he was in great distress of mind, on account of the supposed death of his friend ; then the vizier rejoiced his heart by introducing the friend well and sound. But Vashti was no longer to be got, and the perplexed courtiers did not know any other way of extricating themselves from the dilemma but to look for another woman, who by her especial charms would captivate the king and would occupy his leisure, as only Vashti could, and since her no one else. They therefore propose to the king to send out officers¹ all over the country to bring every beautiful girl to Shushan. They should be brought to the harem (בֵּית הַנְשִׁים), and placed under the supervision of the הַנָּא, viz. of the Aga (Sanscr. dja), the keeper, who would introduce them to the king after they had undergone a due course of preparation (vers. 9, 12). Among so many, there would certainly be one to whom the king would take a fancy, and make her what is called in the court language of the Osmans, a Chasseki, a favourite, in the place of Vashti. The proposal pleased the king, and he issued an order accordingly.

One cannot but admire the simple, quiet historical style of our narrative. Laying aside all the reports which would only prolong our way of coming to the essential part of the contents of the book, there is nothing omitted which would contribute to the historical and psychological introduction and illustration. How much was necessary to happen before Israel could have ready help in time of need ! What great things, according to external appearance, must precede, in order to make it possible that a Jewish girl by the influence of her charms should ascend the throne of a Chasseki in the Persian kingdom ! The great conference of all the officers of the State, the dreadful war with Greece, and the unfortunate issue of the same, were they not in the hands of Providence so many stepping-stones in the path of Esther's ascendancy ? In order to replace the loss of the special beauty of Vashti, a woman of equal endowments must be sought for the king, wherever and however it might be ! How many things must subserve to the frustration of Haman's wicked plan ! The wrath of Xerxes against Greece, and his wrath against his wife. Court intrigues against the powerful influences of a wife, and the vain conceit of offended sovereignty. First drunkenness, then homicidal passion, then new excited sensuality, were the sad instruments which preceded the redemption of Israel. When the people were delivered, they could well be penitent when they especially considered the way in which Vashti—though not herself guiltless—was one of the main causes of their deliverance. And if deep penitence must have resulted from the reflection that a woman like Vashti had to die a violent death in order that the people of God should live,—what kind of penitence must the thought call forth when we remember that Christ gave His life in order that Israel and the Gentiles might live, and that the apostles of the truth, walking in His footsteps, went through fire and sword in order to save souls !

Israel passed through the conflagration of Jerusalem on their road to conversion. In the court of Nebuchadnezzar originated the prophecy of Daniel. Through the harem went the wonderful intervention of Esther on behalf of her people. The Hebrew word for harem, בֵּית הַנְשִׁים (which only occurs in this book), does not correspond to the Arabic haram, meaning sacredness, devotion, but comes rather near to the Turkish Odalik: the Gynaeceum, the house of the women, in contradistinction to the house of the men. It must not be assumed that the formation of the word implies an immoral motive, nor that the institution of polygamy was in itself the product of greater depravity of the human heart than the natural man commonly possesses. The opinion of some, that the harem was the consequence of Oriental despotism, is also erroneous. It arose from the radical views of heathenism, viz. that the passions of the natural man are not to be restrained, but legalized ; and also that the natural right of a husband over his wife is not to be controlled by moral rules, but to be left to his arbitrary will, as an indisputable and constitutional right. With both polygamy and despotism social conditions of time and place were so closely connected, that they survived in their degenerating and baneful influence the principle of heathenism which originated them. What we find of both, in the history of Israel of the Old Testament, are relics of social customs, which had themselves vanished before the thought of the living and holy God of the Decalogue ; and even these during their continuance appeared in their purest possible form.

The repentance of David, the deepest human self-abasement in confession and faith, touches his pleasures in the harem as well as the abuse of his royal power. But repentance and faith towards the pure and holy God are wanting in heathenism. This corrective of the deepest social wisdom was therefore also unknown both to Oriental and occidental heathen States. Hence the kingdom of the countries on the Euphrates and the Tigris had become a despotic caricature ; hence, too, the institution of the harem, and the degrading effects, especially upon women, that were connected with it and proceeded from it, made such progress. There is nothing legendary in the story that is told in the commencement of The Thousand and One Nights, that the caliph believed he had a right to behead his wife any day.

The Persian king of antiquity, like the modern shah and sultan, arrogated to himself this historical prerogative. In his privilege to do everything there was a representation of the highest power of the husband over his wife, at least so far as external means allowed. He had the command over the life and death of all the men, so also over the bodies and enjoyment of all the women. Xerxes should send out a commission all over the country in search of beautiful damsels, in order that his longing after a favourite might be satisfied. This was not a sudden outbreak of an unheard-of act of violence. It was nothing else but the expression of a universally recognised right, or rather of a heavy yoke. When Alexander the Great did the same, and caused beautiful women from all Asia¹ to be brought to his house, he intended also to show therewith that he completely succeeded to the claims of the Persian great king. The harem of the new Persian shah is supplied in the same manner. Chardin gives an instructive representation of the process of fetching and despatching the beauties. In some cases, in modern times, the parents rather like the idea that a daughter of theirs should be demanded for the harem, for they promise themselves to obtain thereby a certain amount of influence and interest at court. Sometimes, it is further said, the king himself goes among the Armenians in search of beautiful wives. It is therefore the custom among these to betroth their daughters when still young, because such are not taken away. But, alas! sometimes it happened that these searches were used as a means of exercising private spite, hatred, and revenge, and the Armenians (so-called Christians) have denounced each other when families had concealed their daughters from the vile inquisitors of the king (Voyage, vi. 242). Married women were mostly spared, not because of want of right, but because virgins were needed.²

Among the Mongolian shahs, it is said that the prince has a statute right to demand the wives of his subjects. On account of this circumstance there was a long war in 1320, because an emir would not give up his wife, Bagdad-Khatun (Desguignes, iii. 303). In the Osman Empire also, under some sultans, such cruelty was carried on to great excess. New slaves used to be sought for Sultan Ibrahim, in order that each Friday he should have a new one brought to him as to a religious solemnity. He fancied he would like a favourite of high stature, and search was consequently made all over Constantinople for such a person ; and, after a good deal of trouble, they found at last an Armenian woman who was tall as a giant. She succeeded in ingratiating herself into his favour, so that, she became most powerful, and provoked the jealousy of the other women, until, at last, the sultana invited her to an entertainment, where she caused her to be strangled. It was then reported that she died suddenly (Hammer, v. 359).

² In vers. 2 and 3 it is said כל נערה בחוליה shall be sought. Chardin says, vi. 226: "Il n'y entre que des vierges. Quand on en sait quelqu'une parfaite en beauté, en quelque endroit que ce soit, on la demande pour le Haram et cela ne se refuse point."

For David also a handsome damsel was sought in all Israel ; but it was in order that she might nurse the old man. After he repented he became master of himself. We read, "she cherished the king, and ministered to him ; but the king knew her not" (1 Kings i. 4).

Ver. 5. "There was a certain Jew in Shushan," etc.

The history passes now into that of Israel. The narrative of the selection of a virgin for the royal harem is only interrupted for the sake of introducing certain persons, in reference to whom all the reports were thus far made. These are two in number, a man and a woman, uncle and niece, guardian and minor. They form the central point of the book. They are the deliverers of Israel. "A certain Jew was in Shushan the castle." The name Yehudi (Jew) came in vogue in Southern Palestine after the separation of the ten tribes under Rehoboam. The kingdom of Judah stood in opposition to the kingdom of Israel. It still continued for a century after that of Israel had passed away, and during this time there was but one Yehudah, or Judea, in the Holy Land. The conquest and the rule of Nebuchadnezzar obscured all preceding events. The deeds of Shalmaneser receded to the background. By Nebuchadnezzar the holy city Jerusalem was conquered, and the inhabitants of the kingdom, who were called Jews (2 Kings xvi. 6, xxv. 25), were by him led into exile. These last, through keeping closely together, in order to maintain the national faith, have made the name Yehudi especially distinguished. The sharp contrast between Judah and Israel was given up in a strange land. To the ten tribes, in the penitent sorrow of the exile, the name of Jerusalem was again a dearly loved and cherished one. The breach caused by the secession of Jeroboam was only repaired in the captivity. While Israel, the ideal Biblical name, only expressed their humiliated position before God, the name Jew became universally known as the designation of every one who manifested the faith of Israel. Therefore all the captives are called Jews in the book of Esther, although it cannot be proved that all of whom it treats belonged to the captivity of Nebuchadnezzar, as there must have been some there who were taken captives by his predecessor Shalmaneser.

The districts in which Nebuchadnezzar distributed the Jews are not clearly defined. We learn only from Dan. i. 2 that they were taken to Shinar, i.e. to Babylon. Zerubbabel brought back Jews who had lived in Babylon (Ezra i. 11–ii. 1). But such also joined them who had come from Tel-melach, Telcharsha, Cherub, and Addan, names which define the old Elymais, i.e. Loristan (see my Geschichte der Juden, p. 173). It is well known that not all came back under the leadership of Zerubbabel. The permission of Cyrus for their return home was evidently not merely an act of kindness on his part, but also an act of policy, as we shall see farther on. It was certainly only Jewish colonies of definite districts which emigrated. It was not of the highest importance to Cyrus to found there a new mighty State, which might afterwards become independent, but only that these territories should be settled by weak and thankful colonies who entertained anti-Babylonian sentiments. There yet remained behind a multitude, notably in Shushan, from which place, the residence of Daniel and Nehemiah, none seem to have been sent back (Dan. viii. 2; Neh. i. 1).

The man is called Mordecai. This name does not occur in Israel before the captivity. Another captive who returned with Zerubbabel is so called Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7. It is the name of one who was born in exile. It is according to Persian analogy.¹

In the first syllable it corresponds to Mardonius (מָרְדֹּנִי), Mardontes, Mardus; in the last it is like that of Artachaeus or Artachaes (comp. Herod. vii. 22). One is reminded of something similar in the names of Mardokempad and Mesesimordak in the Canon of Ptolemy. To say that Mordecai the Jew had his name from the idol Merodach, would not certainly be true; but the name of the idol is itself derived from the Sanscr. martiya, Arm. mart, Pers. merd = man, and it does not preclude the supposition that other compounds were used with this word.² Moreover, when the name of Mordecai was once currently used, the Jew could bear it with as great indifference to its allusion as the Christian St. Martin could bear his name, which is derived from Mars.

At any rate, the derivation of the name — apart from Merodach — from mart, merd = man, signifying “the manly,” is clearer and surer than the one proposed by Oppert, who thinks it is derived from the modern Persian mardu, meaning “soft.” But it is remarkable that the name Mordecai is only given to a native of the captivity; and this circumstance corroborates the otherwise evident fact, that

² See my article “Mordecai” in Herzog’s Realencyklop. p. 365.

Mordecai was not one of those who were exiled, as it was curiously enough concluded from ver. 6, where we read: "And his name was Mordecai, the son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite; who had been carried away from Jerusalem with the captives, which had been carried away with Jechoniah (Jehoiachin), king of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away."

The clear and instructive intentions of the historian in the genealogical passage are evident. He points out, through the enumeration of the four generations from Kish to Mordecai, the time which elapsed since the banishment of Jechoniah, which took place before the destruction of the temple. The period of about 115–120 years which since then elapsed to the sixth year of Xerxes are exactly expressed by the four generations. We have also some intimation concerning the period of the narrative, which is assigned to the reign of Xerxes I. That Kish was a Benjamite, is only told for the purpose of distinguishing him from other men with the same name who belonged to the tribe of Levi. One might have thought it impossible that Biblical expositors should commit the mistake of making the information concerning the exile of Jechoniah refer to Mordecai himself,—an idea for which there is neither textual nor historical foundation, but rather both against it. If this had been the case, the author would have placed Ahhashverosh immediately after Nebuchadnezzar; but this could not be so, according to the narrative in Daniel and Ezra, whoever we may consider Ahhashverosh to be. The author is well acquainted with the fact that a king of Persia, of whom he reports, succeeded Cyrus; for he puts Persia before Media. If the relation וְנִ in ver. 6 refers to Mordecai and not to Nebuchadnezzar, there would have been no reason why the narrator should only mention the three generations Jair, Shimei, and Kish, and, indeed, why he should mention more than Mordecai's father, as he does similarly in ver. 15, where he mentions only Esther's father, Abihail. The opinion of the Midrash, that by Kish is here to be understood the father of King Saul, is only homiletical trifling, and hardly deserves notice.

If that Kish had been meant, King Saul or any other member in the genealogical line as given in 1 Sam. ix. would have been mentioned; but this is not the case. Again, the opinion that this Mordecai is identical with the one of Ezra ii. 2, who returned to Jerusalem, is also groundless. First, because this one came from Babylon, and not from Shushan. Secondly, the book of Ezra itself reports that Ahhashverosh, whoever he may be, reigned after Cyrus, and therefore Mordecai would have reached an excessively great age if he had been one of those carried into exile by Nebuchadnezzar, as there were about sixty years from the banishment of Jechoniah to the return of the captives with Zerubbabel. We would reach the monstrous conclusion of the Duke of Manchester, and of the German doctors after him, which the Biblical genealogy itself destroys, if the relation מְרֹדְכָּי be arbitrarily connected with Mordecai, instead of, as it naturally is, with the last name. Above all things, it is necessary to be cautious of theories, for the sake of which all the hitherto received and well-established views are thrown overboard; whilst, when we follow the simple rendering of the verse as indicated, everything is beautifully harmonious.

The Midrash (Esther 92a) makes in its own fanciful way a peculiar and groundless assertion upon the position of the word וְשִׁם his name. It says: When the Scripture speaks of a bad man, the word וְשִׁם stands after his name, as Nabal his name; when it speaks of a good man, as here of Mordecai, it stands before. "And his name was Mordecai." But וְשִׁם stands before Micah in Judg. xvii. 1; before Doeg, 1 Sam. xxi. 7; before Sheba, "a man of Belial," 2 Sam. xx. 1; and before others who cannot be reckoned among the good. On the other hand, the word stands after Josiah, 1 Kings xiii. 2; after Daniel, Dan. x. 1; and after the names of the best men, and, above all, after the Messiah, Zech. vi. 12, where we read, "Behold the man, Zemach (i.e. Branch) is his name, he shall build the temple of the Lord."

The fourth generation from the exile of Jechoniah witnessed the events of which this book treats. Mordecai must still have been in the prime of life. He had a relation Abihail, who died and left an orphan daughter behind. This girl, Mordecai, of whose wife or children nothing is reported, took to his house, as there was no nearer relative, and he became her nursing father, מִנְחָה, from her youth. For the word מִנְחָה or אַמְנָה implies nursing of a child from its infancy, as Naomi was the nurse of the child of Ruth from its birth (Ruth iv. 16), and as Moses said to the Lord: “Have I conceived all this people? have I brought them forth, that Thou shouldest say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing father carries the sucking child?” (Num. xi. 12). He cherished her as a father and mother cherish their own child; and the whole narrative shows that this was not done perfunctorily, but with his whole heart.

Ver. 7. אַתְּ הַדָּרֶת הִיא אֲסֹתֶר—“Hadassah, that is, Esther.”

The girl was called in the house of her parents and of Mordecai, Hadassah, i.e. “Myrtle,” Myrto, a name which in very ancient times had reference to the connection of beauty with fruitfulness; hence it was a symbol of Venus, and was therefore appropriately chosen as an epithet to the girl. Jewish women, as among other Eastern nations, have always had names borrowed from flowers. We need only refer to the names of Jewish women which have come down to us from all the Middle Ages, such as Flora, Myrrha, Blümchen, Blume, Rosa, Fiore, etc. (see Zunz, Namen der Juden, p. 73, etc.).

The Midrash acknowledges this in its comment on the passage. It says, Mordecai’s cousin was called Myrtle, like the righteous, because she never faded, but was always blooming both in summer and in winter. They apply to her Isa. lv. 13, where we read: “Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree,” understanding, of course, by the thorn and brier Vashti, and by the myrtle Esther (Bab.

Megilla 10b). On the other hand, the Church Father [Jerome] refers this passage to the Apostle Paul. "At that time," says he, "when he preached the gospel in the world, and could say, 'We are a sweet savour of Christ' (2 Cor. ii. 15), he is rightly called a cypress and myrtle tree" (Comm. ad Jes., ed. Migne, iv. 538). But the prophecy goes beyond the preacher of the truth to the truth itself. The Talmudical word for myrtle is אַמְרָא, as in Syriac. Compare with it the Persian אַסְמוֹסָא (see Vullers, i. 601).

Esther was the name which the girl received in the harem as a favourite of the king. R. Nehemia (in Megilla 13b)¹ correctly derives the name from אַסְתָּר, or as the Targum writes it, אַיְשָׁתָרָא, after the Greek ἀστήρ, star; Syr. אַסְתָּרָא; Pers. سَتَّارَه; Zend. stara. And in Persian it has the special sense of the lustre of Venus, Fortuna (sidus genethliacum), of the morning star (see Vullers, ii. 220), as the Persians call the king, "the morning star of the throne." Such names were customary for the wives and favourites in the East. The Caliph Hisham II. of Spain gave to his beloved Radhiyet the surname of Fortunate Star (Hammer, Namen der Araber, p. 11).

The name of the legitimate wife of Xerxes, Amestrис² (Herod. vii. 61–114, and ix. 169), will likewise be best explained from the compound of Amesha (אַמְשָׁה) and Sitra, סְתָּרָה, meaning heavenly star. For with Amesha (heavenly, immortal) and Cagenta are also the seven genii designated, which are the gods of the seven planets. Some have thought that they could find the name of Hadassah, myrtle, reproduced in the name of Atossa, the wife of Darius. The circumstance against this is, that Hadassah is only a Hebrew word. We may rather consider that it has some relation

² Comp. the name of the beautiful Amazon in Hyrcania, Θάληστρις, in Diodor. xvii. 77, in respect to the latter part of the name, and of Amytis (by Ctesias), daughter of Cyaxares, in respect to the first part.

with the Persian word אַתָּשׁ, light, splendour, fire. With this word the Persians designated the phoenix on account of its magnificent brilliancy, and by the term אַתָּשׁ בְּהָאָר they called the red rose and the tulip, as the splendour of spring. Likewise the name Roxane,¹ the beautiful wife of Alexander, is explained to be derived from the Roshen Pehlvi, ראשנה, meaning “the shining one.” The favourite of the Spanish Caliph Abderrahman III. was called Nureddunja, “the light of the world.” A famous woman in the harem of Stamboul was called Nurbanu, “woman of light;” another in the Muhamedan India had the name of Nurmahal, “light of the harem.” Famous Chassekis of the Osman sultans were called Mahpeiker, “moonlike” (this is a favourite expression of Firdussi for a girl). Mahfirus, “favourite of the crescent;” Mihrmah, “sun-moon.” Other such peculiar names are as follows:—Parysatis, the mother of Artaxerxes II., in later form Perisade, “the perichild” or “angel’s child;” the wife of the Caliph Mothaded was named Kothronneda, “dewdrop.” An Osman Chasseki of Grecian birth was called Rebia Gulnusch, “rose-drink of spring.” Favourite female slaves had such names: Dshanfeda, “offering of soul;” Sudshbagli, “the one with plaited hair” (Hammer, Gesch. viii. 358); Sheckerbuli, “sugar-plum;” Sheckerpara, “sweetmeat;” Sheckerchatun, “sugar-woman.” This last was a princess at Delhi at the time of Firuzshah. The famous Kösem was called Ssafiye, “the pure.” Jewesses also were called so (comp. Weil, Leben Mohammeds, p. 186), as the names of Reine, Reinchen occur among them. We conclude with the names of two wives of Darius, Phaidyme and Parmys. The former may properly be compared with Fatime of later times; but Parmys is to be taken as the reproduction of ברמיה, the name of a cow, which according to the legend suckled King Feridon, the most renowned person in all Persian traditions (Vullers, i. 226). How much truth is represented by the Oriental fable, is seen from the collection of names of favourites which is contained in the story of The Thousand and One Nights. We meet there with such a name as Queen Labe (sun). The Caliph Harun had female slaves with the names of Alabaster-throat, Coral-mouth, Coral-branch, Moon-face, Full-moon of the full-moons, Sunshine, Pearl-necklace, Dawn of the morning, Garden-flower, Sugarcane, and the most favourite name of all, Morning-star (see xi. 27, xii. 102).¹

וְהַנֵּרֶה יִפְתָּחָר וּטוֹבָה מְرָאָה — “And the maiden was fair and beautiful.”

The first adjective expresses in the original, to a certain degree, the regular beauty of her figure; the second expresses the gracefulness and amiability of her manners. The Midrash has a very curious homily about her age. In spite of the text, which calls her a נֵרֶה, i.e. a young girl, the Rabbis are divided in their opinion about her age. Some maintain that she was from forty to eighty years old. Others again declare that she was seventy-four years old, because the letters of Hadassah, הַדָּסָה, are numerically equivalent to seventy-four, and because Abraham was also seventy-five years old when he left Haran. The sense of this homiletical peculiarity is, that there was something very wonderful in the reception of Esther by the king. Although she was so old, yet she so miraculously found favour in his sight. Nevertheless the Rabbis would not have come to this strange comment if they had not felt the logical necessity of assigning to Esther at this period of the story such an advanced age, in order to make the supposition that Mordecai had already been among the captives of Nebuchadnezzar tenable. It is their fashion thus to meet by way of homily historical difficulties, and solve them by combinations of letters. Now, as such homiletical solutions are contrary to reason, they just prove what they want to avoid, viz. the monstrous anachronism by which Mordecai is placed as far back as the time of Nebuchadnezzar.

Ver. 8.—וַיְהִי בַּחֲמֹת—So it came to pass, when the king's commandment and his decree was heard."

The notice in this verse is not given without reason. If Esther was so beautiful, the circumstance easily explains itself why, in the midst of the great choice of beauties that were to be brought to Shushan, she was not overlooked. Jewish tradition informs us, through the Targum, that Mordecai, her guardian and second father, had kept her concealed, in order not to be obliged to deliver her to the royal agents; but people who knew her, and had not seen her for some time among the girls, drew their attention to the concealment. This they reported to the king, who immediately issued an order, to the effect that wherever it has come to the knowledge of the authorities that a man had refused to deliver his daughter, he should be hanged by the neck before his own house.

What is here told does certainly correspond to Eastern custom, but our book gives no occasion for it. The tradition originated in the East, where the search after women for the harem had become an intolerable nuisance, especially to the oppressed population. It was therefore quite natural to suppose that Mordecai did all he could, as loving parents do sometimes now-a-days, to keep Esther away from the covetous eyes of the royal eunuchs. The Midrash wanted in this manner to characterize more closely both the admirable beauty of Esther and the prudent precaution and love of her uncle. But this does not at all harmonize with the higher ideas of the narrative. Here it is precisely and instructively intimated, that no especial attention had been directed to Esther. She was fetched in the ordinary way with crowds of girls. As one plucks flowers in a garden to present a bouquet to a dear friend, so they here collected a variety of human beings from all places for sensual enjoyment, provided they had any attractiveness and colour. The gardener was the הָנִי הַגָּנֶן (הָנִי, ver. 3), Aga, the keeper of the women, who had the charge of the women's house. This was the most important person in such acts as here described. As the damsels were introduced by him to the king, his influence and his favour was of great weight. The intention of the narrative of our book is manifestly to show the wonderful help which was provided for Israel for the time of their need. This is to appear exactly from the opposite fact, that Esther was not concealed, but at once found and given up. The cleverness and the taste of the people who fetched her, and of those who administered the affairs of the harem, were also instruments of deliverance in God's hands.

Among the hundreds who were placed under the care of the Aga, the gracefulness of Esther struck him the most.

Ver. 9. וְחִיטֵּב הַנְּעָרָה—“And the maiden pleased him.”

Curtius narrates (viii. 4. 23, etc.) that it happened when once Alexander was at a banquet, there were thirty noble virgins presented to him; but although they were all of the choicest beauty, yet the eyes of all were directed to Roxane, as she surpassed them in good looks. (Quae quanquam inter electas processerat, omnium tamen oculos convertit in se.) The same was the case with Esther. The experienced eye of the Aga was beyond all attracted by her, and he paid her the best attention, and showed her favours, which were of importance to her and her friend's future career. The Midrash says that he foresaw that she would eventually become queen, and therefore he was so friendly to her. But this is false. Rather was it, that Esther's gracefulness pleased him so much that he undertook, so far as lay in his power, to risk everything in order to make her queen. The pleasure which he had in her he manifested by special exertions in her behalf, for the purpose of increasing her natural beauty by artificial means. It is said first of him, —וַיָּבֹהַל אֲתָה חִמְרֹקִיה. The original meaning of בַּהַל, whose organic root is לָה, is represented by the German word eilen, to hasten. Yes, it is clear that this German word, which does not occur in the Gothic, and whose origin Grimm did not discern, is connected with the Old German word illan, Old S. German ilian. The Greek word ἀμιλλάσθαι is similarly connected with ἄμα. The idea of hastening contains in it the cause for doing so, an anxiety to carry out some important duty or strenuous order; therefore also trembling, terror in general. Here in our passage the verb בַּהַל has the sense of hurrying to carry out a duty and a privilege. He delivered to Esther prior to all others, even before her turn came to receive them, the necessary materials provided for the women's toilet before they could be introduced to the king; and he meant the quick despatch of this business as a favour to her; for the longer she participated in his nursing care, the more beautiful she would become. We read: "And he speedily gave her things for purification, with her portions." Each newcomer to the harem must first undergo an ablution in order to refresh herself, etc.; and this custom is also observed in the case of young girls, because the bath is the most essential part, according to Oriental custom, in the process of effecting a good bodily appearance, with which all other adornment is connected. So then the word חִמְרֹק has evidently received the meaning of preparing the toilet, and of things generally necessary for making a good début.

The portions (מנות) consisted of magnificent dresses and ornaments, which were given to every woman of the harem.¹

Not only was Esther privileged in speedily receiving everything necessary for her external appearance, but she also received seven selected slaves to wait upon her. In the word הַרְאִיּוֹת, part. pass. pers. pl., which only occurs in this passage, lies the significance of the selection of the servants which were proper for her. As all who were gathered received their share of servants, the distinction shown to her could not have consisted in the point of time when she received the servants, but in point of their qualifications and appearance. They were of the very best sort. Likewise in point of number, they were seven, the same number of servants as were allotted to the great court ladies.

The Targum has a peculiar comment upon the number of servants. In order to show how Esther could, amidst her surroundings, remember which day was the Sabbath, it says that she knew this from the number of her slaves; for every day she had another to wait upon her, who was called by the name of the day of the week, and thus when the one who served on the Sabbath came to wait upon her, she knew that it was the Sabbath day. It is certainly a peculiar Oriental thought which makes a calendar of human beings. The Targum also further gives the names of the seven slaves, and that in a poetical and instructive manner. We have already mentioned that the servants as well as mistresses have poetical names, borrowed from nature. This is imitated in the Targum; but the Jewish teachers themselves had not noticed it before. They took these names from the history of the creation, so that they can only be elucidated from the things that were created in the first week. But this comment gives undoubtedly the appearance of being tinctured with Christian ideas. We begin with Monday, in which the firmament or sky was created. This is in Hebrew רָקִיעֵם. The slave which waited upon Esther on this day was therefore called רוּקְעִיתָא, better רָקְעִיתָא, meaning something like "Heaven's child." On Tuesday were created the trees, their fruit and all vegetables, and so the name of the slave of the day was גַּןְוִינְתָּא, from גַּן, "the garden," corresponding to "Garden-flower."

On the fourth day, Wednesday, were created the stars of heaven (as they are called in the Targum, Gen. i. 14, נְהוֹרִיתָא), and therefore the name of the servant of the day was נְהוֹרִיתָא, “Starlight.” On Thursday were created all creeping things. The Hebrew word שְׁרֵץ is expressed in the Talmud by רְחִישָׁ, therefore the attendant of this day is named רְחִישָׁתָא, “Butterfly.” By the way, through this explanation the reading is established, and the נ of Mezahh Ahron, etc., is erroneous. Remarkable is the name of the slave who attended her on the sixth day, in which the cattle and man were created. It is חַוְרֶפֶתָא, the diminutive form of חַוְרֶפֶא, meaning in Chald. and Syriac the “Lamb” (see Targ. Gen. xxi. 29), “Little lamb.” Be it remembered that Friday is designated by a lamb, which certainly is in accord with the Christian remembrance of Him who as the Lamb of God was led to the slaughter on that day.

The seventh day is the Sabbath, the day of rest, the quiet time. Therefore the name of the servant is רְגֻעִיתָא, “Quiet.” For רְגֻעָה is rendered “quiet” both by Jewish and Christian commentators in Ps. xxxv. 20 — “the quiet in the land.” The servant “Quiet” reminded Esther that it was the Sabbath. The day following the Sabbath, our Lord’s day, on which the light was created, Esther had an attendant whose name was חַוְלֶתָא, which is best explained from חַוְלָה, the name of a rare bird, which is taken mostly, though not always rightly, to be the phoenix (see my Schwan, p. L). The phoenix is a symbol of light; and so we see here, as in connection with Friday, traces of Christian symbolism, in which the lamb of Friday is the risen phoenix of Sunday. But the Aga was not satisfied with the mere giving to Esther her ornaments sooner than to the rest, and the best of servants. He assigned also to her and to her servants the best apartments in the house. The phrase וַיְשַׁנֵּה וְאַתְּ-גַעֲרוֹתָה לְטוֹב בֵּית הַנְּשִׁים can have no other sense than that he changed the place where she had dwelt into a better. But if וַיְשַׁנֵּה refers to her person, then it reads, “he wrought a change in her for the best (לְטוֹב) in reference to the house of the women.” We may translate the verb תָּשַׁלֵּחַ, after the Syriac example in Acts vii. 43, by “transtulit,” “he transferred her.”

Ver. 10. לֹא־הִנֵּידָה אֲסֻתֶּר אֶת־עַמָּה—“Esther had not showed her people nor her kindred; for Mordecai had charged her that she should not show it.”

This prohibition testifies to his wisdom and piety. It becomes now evident why so much stress is laid in ver. 7 on the fact that Esther had lost her parents, and that Mordecai had adopted her as his daughter. If her parents had been alive, such concealment of nationality on her part would have been next to impossible. It would have been difficult for her to hide her origin, and the parental love and her own filial love would have sooner or later betrayed it. But Mordecai, who did not love her less than her own parents, had that good sense and that judgment which are better safeguards to love than vanity and self-pleasing, which are so often mixed up with the better feelings in the hearts of parents. Esther belonged to a people in the kingdom which politically and religiously represented a marked contrast to the ruling people. The accusation which Haman afterwards brought against them had surely occupied the public attention of the conquerors and the priests before. At all events, it must have been useful for Esther to conceal her descent. As she was now exalted to such a high position, her only aim must have been to find favour in the eyes of the king; and to this end a knowledge of her nationality in the circle of the house of women could in nowise be advantageous to her. Indeed it might rather, sooner or later, imperil both the position of Esther and that of her people. Mordecai, who was at home in Persia, was well acquainted with the conditions of the court and of the capital. How easily could Esther fall into disgrace, as Vashti did, and so herself be the main cause of her people’s misfortunes (see Yalkut on the passage)! So also in the contrary event, as the history has taught, what dangers would ensue to Esther from her nationality being known, if persecutions against the Jews should arise ! The deliverance which she was later called to achieve succeeded, humanly speaking, only because no one knew that she belonged to Israel. Had it been known, the intrigues for her destruction would have been commenced. Add to this that the king was perhaps favourably disposed to other Jews besides her, whose position had to be taken into consideration ; and if it had been known that she also was a Jewess, envious tongues would have been busy with the charge of preponderating Jewish influence at court.

The Midrash says that Mordecai showed his modesty by prohibiting Esther from making her pedigree known. There is truth in this. He certainly thereby renounced claims upon honours and presents which would have fallen to him as her nearest kindred. Chardin says that it is still the custom in modern Persia to give pensions to the family of a lady of the seraglio ; and the more she is esteemed by the king, the greater are the pensions (Voyage, vi. 626, 627). But Mordecai had love for his people and for his [adopted] daughter ; but he had no desire for the acquisition of money and honours. Thus he could the more freely observe what was going on at court. It might be asked, how was it possible that Esther's nationality should remain a sealed secret ?¹ But the secret was in Esther's own hands, and entirely depended upon her discretion as to the time of revealing it. For the arbitrary and domineering spirit with which women are sought and bought in the name of the king is above all the petty differences of nationality, which it does not care to inquire into. Beauty and enjoyment are sought. The person who is admitted into the seraglio needs only to have physical good looks. History, name, parents, and birth are of no account. During the time in which the Turks carried on a prolonged war with Christian nations in Europe, the sultans carried on their vicious amusements with women from Greece, Russia, Poland, Hungary, and Italy. So was the Sultana Tarshan in the seventeenth century a Pole, Baffa the powerful concubine of Murad IV. was from Venice, and Kosen the mother of Ibrahim the Vicious was a Greek. That the origin of even such distinguished persons who had left their mark upon history was unknown, is testified by the various reports concerning Churem, the favourite of Soliman I., who was an extraordinary woman. French authors say that she was a peasant woman. Other writers affirm that she was the sister of King Sigismund, so that the latter would be, of course, Soliman's brother - in - law. Others again say that she was a native of Siena in Italy, a daughter of Nani Marsigli, and had been kidnapped by robbers. If so, through her the Pope Alexander became related to the sultan. But as she is usually called a Russian, she must have come from Galicia. Count Rzewuski asserted that she was the daughter of a poor pope (priest) of Rohatyn, a small town in Galicia¹ (comp. Hammer, Osm. Gesch. iii. 672, 673, and 736). The Oriental legend tells that even slaves sometimes kept their origin a profound secret. A sultan said once that he did not want a favourite of unknown origin, for he feared that he would have bad children by her (The Thousand and One Nights, xix. p. 97). The maidens were delivered to the Aga without a name and without a history, only as so many bodies, and not even as a modern flock of camels, which possess a history, biography, and photography. The Aga had before him a multitude of beautiful faces; and he cared nothing as to which nation they belonged. When it came to his knowledge, it was through the women themselves, who sought to gain some advantage for their relations. It therefore sufficed that Mordecai should forbid Esther herself to tell of her origin, as the information would not come from other quarters. For as soon as she was in the seraglio all access to her ceased, and Mordecai was silent.

Ver. 11. "And Mordecai walked every day before the court of the women's house," etc.

But though he asked Esther to deny any knowledge of him, yet his anxious paternal care for her did not cease. As an apparent stranger, it was perhaps the more easy for him to make inquiries about her welfare and proceedings; and so he was daily to be seen in the neighbourhood of the court. The Midrash thinks that he was anxious lest she should be enchanted, a belief which to this day still exists in the East.

Ver. 12. "Now when the turn of every maiden was come."

We have here an exact description of the events that took place in the inner circle of the house of women. But this is not for the purpose of telling us an anecdote from the secrets of the harem. It is thereby emphatically intimated how wonderful the providences were by which Esther reached her happy goal. We learn from Herodotus (iii. 69) that Phaedyme, in order to investigate whether there were certain marks upon the body of the false Smerdis, had to wait till her turn came to be called to the king; for, he adds, "the Persians let their wives come to them by turns" (ἐν περιτροπῇ γὰρ δὴ γυναῖκες φοιτέουσι τοῖσι Πέρσῃσι). This successive turn was not a slight interval; it lasted, it is said, a twelve-month,—a year then, in which every newly-received woman had time to prepare herself for the day of meeting the king.—Now such turns were daily occurrences, consequently the number of court women must have been about 360. In this matter also we see how closely our book agrees with the otherwise known notices of classical writers, and how much light it throws upon them. Curtius narrates (and is confirmed by Plutarch) that Darius had 360 women with him (iii. 3. 24). When Dicaearch says in Athenaeus (lib. xiii. 557) that there were only 350, the notice in our book leads us to give more credence to the report of Curtius. It is a characteristic feature of the great King of Persia that he has the liberty of having every day in the year another woman to wait upon him. This Diodorus expressly says when he narrates of Alexander the Great, that he had entirely adopted the luxurious habits of a Persian ruler. His words are: "He led with him concubines, like Darius, who were not less in number than the days of the year"¹ ("οὐκ ἐλάττους πλήθει τῶν κατὰ τὸν ἔνιαυτὸν ἡμερῶν," xvii. 77). These were to the number of 360, as Curtius expressly states (vi. 6. 8, Pellices ccc. et lx. totidem, quo Dario fuerant, regiam implebant). Yet the avarice and luxury of the princes in later times was not satisfied even with this number. The Osman sultan Murad III. had 40 favourites and 500 female slaves; but 400 appears to be the round number with the Persian shahs, as is evident from the narrative of Chardin (Voyage, vi. 243).

These twelve months were spent by the women in going through a course of preparation by the application of the means then usual of embellishing their bodies, and all this for one single occasion. There was never a greater caricature of monarchical and manly power, never a more legal degradation and disgrace of woman, than was manifested in the institution of the harem. Certainly it was a question of life with the selected women whether they would be raised as special favourites and queens or not. They therefore must have considered the regulation which required a whole year of personal preparation before meeting the king as a special act of indulgence which his refined taste dictated. It was his pleasure to see a rivalry among the women, and therefore full liberty was given them to this effect. Everything of luxury and pleasure was placed at their disposal ; but this was not in consideration for themselves personally, but only in reference to the eventual enjoyment of the king, just as a landlord decorates a house with fine gilded paper, not for the sake of the walls, but for his own pleasure. We have no exact information in reference to the toilet of the women which was given them during the year. That there was a definite order in this respect is evident from what we read, that six months were spent in the application of oil of myrrh, and six months in the use of sweet odours and other purifications.

מֵר שמן המר ; or is, as is well known, μύρρα, σμύρνα, the fragrant resin of balsamodendron myrrha, which was esteemed very precious in olden times. Famous ointments were made of it. The Arabs, says Athenaeus (lib. xv. p. 688), generally call ointments myrrh, because they are produced from it. Here, without doubt, the precious ointment is meant which in the time of Pliny (Hist. Nat. xiii. 3) was called "royal ointment," because it was used by the kings of the Parthians. It consists of a number of ingredients, among which is myrrh, as in the anointing oil of the Scriptures (Ex. xxx. 25). R. Hhiya-bar Abba explains it correctly by סטכָת (Meg. 13a), viz. στακτή ; and in Athenaeus also we find that myrrha, called stakte, is a kind of ointment. They understand by stakte the drops of oil issuing from fresh myrrh. The explanation of R. Yehudah, that it means אַמְפָקָנָן, is not so correct, as ἔλαιον ὀμφάκιον (όμφάκιον) is oil of unripe olives. To this very day the Orientals like the perfume of very fragrant ointments and pomades as well as of other odours (בשימים). "In the East one lives and is refreshed," says Chardin (iv. 158), "by perfumes, instead of feeling, as in our countries, overcome by them." Eastern stories vividly describe the pleasures of the baths and the embrocations, and of the use of rose-water and other fragrant essences, ointments, and odorous combs, in connection with the course that people go through for improving and adorning their external appearance.¹

Ver. 13. וְבוֹזָה הַנָּעָרָה—"Then in this wise came the maiden unto the king."

This verse is very instructive. Every maiden that was called to appear before the king had the liberty to use any means which, in her estimation, might conduce to her pleasing him. "Whatsoever she desired was given her to go with her out of the house of the women unto the king's house." By the term לִבְוא, "to go with," the Midrash finely understands that she could choose any one to accompany her. Every one had the right of taking servants with them, so that they might form the background in the interview.

But it was no slight matter even for the most pronounced belle to win the most spoiled and sensual king. And one single meeting together was to decide her fate, either of getting a secluded and uninfluential career, or of living all her life long a splendid though luxurious life. For if she had failed to win the affections of the king, she did not return the next morning to the house of the women, which was superintended by the Aga, but she went to the harem, the house of the concubines, where such women were kept and maintained who belonged to the king, and whom he disposed of according to his pleasure.

Ver. 14. The eunuch who was at the head of this second house of women was called Shaashgaz, שָׁאשְׁגָז, from the Persian شَاهِشَغَز, "beautiful," so that his name means "minister of beauties" (as Kislar-Aga).

¹ We refer particularly to the narrative of Ameny (The Thousand and One Nights, xx. 49). Especially instructive matter is to be found in Aelian (Verm. Gesch. xii. 1), where he tells of a Greek woman that was brought to the camp of Cyrus—women followed her whose duty was to plait her hair and to anoint and to rouge her face. Plutarch narrates (sevenwise) that the Sybarite women gave invitations to their friends a year before, in order that they might have time to prepare their toilets.

Ver. 15. וְהַנִּיעַ תְּרִא אֲסֹתֶר — “Now when the turn of Esther,” etc.

All that preceded her were certainly distinguished for their good looks, but none of them had made any good impression upon the king. Finally, it was Esther's chance. In order to intimate the significance of the moment, the narrator just here adds, what he has not done in ver. 7, the name of Abihail her father.¹ He had died early, and the education of Esther, which suited her so well in her present position, was entirely the work of Mordecai. To him, therefore, as her second father, due honour is given in ver. 7, in that she is only called “his uncle's daughter.” Abihail was the brother of Jair, the father of Mordecai. Though דָּוֹר meant originally “friend,” “beloved,” yet later on it came to signify “uncle,” as the word uncle still retains the meaning of “a friend of the house.”

So Mishael and Elizaphan are called the sons of the דָּוֹר, uncle of Aaron, for their father Uzziel was the brother of Amram (Ex. vi. 22; Lev. x. 4). So also Abner is called the son of the uncle, דָּוֹר, of Saul, for his father Ner was a brother of Kish (1 Sam. xiv. 51). The Greek name Θεῖος, Pott rightly derives from Sancr. dhe, to nourish (Etym. Forsch. xiv. 51. Comp. my Comm. on Ruth, p. 213); and when τήθη τηθίς is compared with it, it follows that originally it was applied to the brother of the mother, as it is mostly used so, only that it naturally was extended to the brother of the father also. The same connection of ideas must be ascribed to the Hebrew דָּוֹר. Its radical signification of “love” points to maternal tenderness in nourishing her child with her breast. דָּוֹר belongs to דָּד, “breast,” “mamma,” “nipple.” Comp. שָׁד and חָד.

To the prominence which is given to the father in the Israelitish popular life is to be ascribed the fact, that דָּוֹר represents in Scripture only the patruus and not the avunculus. We may notice that it is characteristic of Roman nations, that for the brother of both parents avunculus is usual rather than patruus, although the former means only the brother of the mother. (Comp. uncle, Wall. unchin, Albanes. unki; cf. Diez, Lex. der rom. Sprache, p. 697.) In the Targum we meet such words as אָחֶב, viz. אָחָבָב, father's brother. Evidently there must have been a corresponding word, מָמָן or דָמָן, for mother's brother. There can be no doubt that from this Hebrew Ahh'ém comes the hitherto unexplained German word Oheim, and that this also meant originally the mother's brother.

The characteristic feature which these words indicate is very significant. The other women could not find enough artificial means with which to make an impression upon the king. The supplies of ornaments and other things which they had received for this purpose from the Aga was deemed by them as insufficient, and they demanded more in order to satisfy their burning desire to become favourites. But Esther cared nothing about these things. She had no such ambitious desires. Her heart did not burn to become something which was indeed illustrious, yet not becoming to a believing Jewess. Reluctantly she had left her home, and reluctantly and passively she put on her ornaments, and did not exert herself to take a single active step to reach the pinnacle of her fellow-women's glory. She was wanted, and ordered to appear, and therefore she obeyed the Aga in causing herself to be dressed up for the occasion, but did not express an urgent desire to see the pomp of the harem. She was compelled to be there; but that was no reason for her to profane her lips and her believing heart. This is not to be lightly estimated. In the midst of women, who are more jealous and ambitious than men, tempted by her own heart to believe that she was the most beautiful of them all, and occupying such vantage ground, to which she was to a certain extent already committed and pledged, a desire on her part to become the mightiest woman, or, at least, to be crowned with the greatest honours, might have found some extenuation. But Esther was superior to this. What she possessed was only obedience—to her second father, and to the necessity. But ambition, a desire to rule, lust of pleasure, she had none. To have virtue and chastity in the heart—when at home, under the protection of parents, is not so difficult. But in the harem, in the midst of all the provisions which sensuality has prepared and ordered, where everything excites the passions, and where royal power casts its dazzling lustre, in such a position still to remain virtuous, requires an education in the divine law of a holy God, such as Esther had received in the house of Mordecai.

“And Esther found favour in the sight of all them that looked upon her.”

She desired nothing, and yet she received what the others had with all their arts [vainly] endeavoured to obtain. Her natural gracefulness of manner, heightened by a charm which all the others did not possess, viz. the charm of an innocent and chaste heart,—which no toilet can supply, and which wantonness and pomp leave the more missing,—captivated all who saw her, even before she went to the king. She pleased all, not merely on account of her beauty, but what is more, on account of her amiability. Her modest and unpretentious behaviour towards everybody won for her the respect of all. Being of a simple and contented disposition, she excited no envy or dislike in others. In contrast with those who preceded her, who, in spite of all the artful means which they used for obtaining more ostentatious ornaments, were yet dissatisfied, and therefore excited dislike against themselves, she was satisfied with the gifts and treatment she received. But where should the others get the charms which only a quiet believing heart can supply in such a place? In the house of sensuality true chastity makes an irresistible impression upon the eyes, countenance, and demeanour. But it was the grace of God which brought such a girl to this place; not for the sake of the king, but for the sake of the danger that was impending upon the people to whom she belonged, and to whom she was attached both in heart and belief.

Ver. 16. "So Esther was taken unto King Ahhashverosh, into his house royal, in the tenth month, which is the month Tebeth, in the seventh year of his reign."

Tebeth is the tenth month in the Jewish year which begins with Nisan according to the Scriptures, and the fourth month in the Jewish year which begins with Tishri according to the traditions. The name was indigenous in Syria and Mesopotamia, where the Jews in the time of the captivity had adopted it and all the new names of the months. The statement that the introduction took place in the tenth month of the seventh year of the reign of the king, evidently refers to the Persian computation of time. Now, if their tenth month was either then called Tebeth, or corresponded to Tebeth, it would follow that, already under Xerxes, the Persian year began in the spring, as is also manifest from the spirit of the teaching of the Avesta. It would also not be erroneous to infer that the introduction of the women to the king began in the Persian spring, so that nine months had passed before Esther's turn came. The ground for the successive turns cannot be ascertained; probably it was in accordance with the priority of the selection for the harem by the Aga. The wonderful dispensation by which Esther was chosen as a favourite of the king is more prominently brought to view by the fact that her turn was not before the tenth month, after hundreds of candidates had gone before her and had been rejected. It may be asked why, if the Aga was well disposed to her, and as it appears from ver. 9 that he facilitated matters for her speedy advancement, did he not introduce her before? To this we answer, that his postponement was actuated by friendly feelings towards her, in not wishing to risk her chance, as he knew that the first were not usually successful. The LXX. and Josephus have on this a surprisingly deviating date, viz. that it took place in the twelfth month, which is Adar ($\delta\omegaδεκάτῳ μηνὶ$, ὅς ἔστιν Ἀδάρ). These chronological variations did not arise from homiletical traditions, which rather adhered to the month Tebeth, but only from a gloss, which must have been made by one who was acquainted with Persian chronology. The same must have added to or explained the statement “which is Tebeth, אדר.¹” For this is the Persian name of the ninth month, with which the tenth month of the Jewish calendar partly agrees. But the LXX. translators took this אדר for the Adar of the Jewish calendar, and consequently had added “in the twelfth month.” The ancient expositors pass over any indication that the tenth of the month Tebeth recalls the sad event of Nebuchadnezzar’s encompassing Jerusalem with his besieging army (Ezek. xxiv. 1, 2). In the month which had a fast day, Esther appeared before the king, that she might finally save Israel by fasting. The month of oppression and distress, caused by the anger of the king, became the month of deliverance occasioned by the love of the king.

Ver. 17. “And he made her queen instead of Vashti.”

The same favour which Esther experienced everywhere, she also found in the eyes of the king. “He loved her more than all the women.” No other maiden found such grace before him, and she became his cherished wife, so that he set the royal crown upon her head. Jewish teachers, who did not like to entertain the notion that Esther enjoyed his love, say that it was not at all herself whom he embraced, but a spirit; while she was all the time in the house of Mordecai. But although a similar superstition was to a great extent prevalent in the Middle Ages, yet the authors of the Zohar ought to have been mindful of the fact, that in their zeal to shield Esther from contamination with the uncircumcised and vicious king, they thereby made her a deceiver.

The Midrash informs us that the king had hitherto the portrait of Vashti suspended over his bed, and now since Esther saw it, he had it removed, and placed hers in its stead (Esther Rabba 99b; Yalkut). This observation is in agreement with contemporary experience. Herodotus narrates (vii. 69) that Darius, the father of Xerxes, had a portrait of his favourite wife Artystone made out of embossed gold. The Jewish teachers quote on this occasion a remarkable saying of R. Berachia, son of Levi (Esther Rabba 92b), “When Israel was in exile, God said to them, ‘You weep before me, and say that you are like orphans who have no father and mother. I will send you a redeemer, who will also be without a father.’”¹ This they apply to Esther. But she had once a father and a mother, and a second father in Mordecai. Israel, indeed, was redeemed by the Messiah, who had no human father.

Ver. 18. “And the king made a great feast.”

The other women were dismissed. But Esther, the king loved. The lot of these great earthly potentates was usually not an enviable one, in spite of their great pomp and magnificence. They possessed power, but no love; they could command, but they knew little of the emotions of the heart’s affection, which are extended to the person loved for his own sake. Just because they extracted sensual enjoyment by force of royal command, they were not in actual possession of love. Extravagant and luxurious persons and times, impoverish the ideal thought of true love, of husband to the wife and of wife to husband, who is also to her the image of divine creation. It is told of Khosru, the great king of Persia, that he chose the highly gifted Sherin as his favourite, but that she loved a poor artist named Ferhad. The joy also of true and inmost love grows only out of morality and out of the belief in an omniscient God. It is written: “The king loved Esther." He found in her a different person from other women. She was modest and unassuming in her bearing. Virtue without covetousness, and obedience in spiritual nobility, not only beautified her face, but also gave her such an imposing charm that the king was moved by higher than mere common feelings when looking at her. In this for him unusual joy he instituted a feast: an Esther-feast (מִשְׁתָּה אֲסֵתֶר) or banquet to celebrate her coronation, as this was the custom everywhere. Besides this, he gave an חַנָּה to the provinces, which the Chaldaic version properly paraphrases by שְׁבֹוק כְּרֻנוֹת, "remission of taxes." Just so the Latin word remissio means, giving rest to the soul (like חַנָּה, from חָנוֹת), as well as release of tribute. The word ἀφεσίς of the LXX., according to its ancient use, has the meaning of dimissio and remissio also in the higher senses of the word. When the pseudo-Smerdis entered upon his reign, he likewise on the ground of such a celebration remitted the taxes for three years (Herod. iii. 67), on which occasion he used the word ἀτέληνή, viz. ἀτέλεια φόρου (comp. 1 Macc. x. 34), where it is spoken of ἀτέλειας καὶ αἰρέσεως, "days without taxes." Herodotus is of opinion that all Persian kings have remitted the taxes when they began to reign (vi. 59). But the Osman sultans, although they have often celebrated weddings and feasts of circumcision with great eclat, have never yet remitted the taxes on such occasions. They have rather compelled their subjects to give them presents, unlike this case, where the king gave the gifts, כִּיד הַמֶּלֶךְ, to his subjects.

¹ [“For it is written, Behold the man whose name is Branch, and he shall bud forth under him” (Zech. vi. 12, R. V.). Again Isa. xi. 1. Midrash of Moses Hadarshan on Gen. xxxvii. 22.—TRANS.]

This expression, כִּיד הַמֶּלֶךְ, is correctly rendered in the R. V. "according to the bounty of the king," i.e. the gifts were plentiful in quantity and worthy in quality.¹ When, in 1675, one of the most pompous feasts were held in Stamboul, every Greek family was obliged to contribute thirty aspers (a Turkish coin), and every ten taxed families at Adrianople had to send six hens, two fat geese, and four ducks (Hammer, vi. 308). The delivery of other presents was also imposed upon Jews and Christians who belonged to corporations and guilds. Entirely different was the munificent action of the King of Persia ; he gave with full hands, remitted the income-tax with a joyful heart, for he loved Esther ; and he who loves gives.

Ver. 19. "And when the virgins were gathered together the second time."

This verse remained obscure to former commentators, and especially in ancient times, so that the LXX. omitted it altogether. But this was very wrong. The verse occupies an important position. It closely connects the foregoing with the following, and only shows the beauty and the simplicity of the thoughts contained in the narrative. It introduces the circumstances under which a new event took place, viz. the conspiracy of the eunuchs and its collapse. This occurrence is placed close to the election of Esther as queen. In ver. 19 the contrast as well as the connection is shown : " And when the virgins were gathered together the second time . . . and when Mordecai sat in the king's gate ;" the elevation of Esther to the rank of queen had not at all interrupted the routine of the harem. Ahhashverosh indeed loved Esther, but of the tyrannical Persian lust of women he had not given up a particle. The temptation to continually acquire new wives was as strong with him as ever, and he could not subdue his sensual infirmities and love of extravagance. He did not issue a decree to recall and annul his former one for the seeking out of women, although his heart had found satisfaction in Esther. The narrator intentionally brings out the contrast. " Look," says he, " just now the king has shown that he loved Esther above all women, and yet other women are so soon sought ! " On the other hand, there is truth in that which the Jewish expositors, if they are rightly understood, seem to have surmised, namely, that the search for new women was intentionally organized in the court, in order that the person of Esther might possibly be eclipsed and placed in the background. One might easily bring analogous cases in Oriental courts as illustrations. The intriguing courtiers and their retinue did not find in Esther, whose origin was not even known to them, a person who would patronise and support their plans and further their influence. This they could only secure by the elevation of another favourite who was more intimately connected with them. This endeavour would not only meet with impunity, but would also, according to Persian court fashion, be considered as an act of loyal demonstration. The king's love to Esther did not at all hinder him from receiving such fresh enjoyments. In his haughty and dark heart there was not a shadow of the thought that such conduct was in fact directed against his love, and against her who was momentarily loved by him. To this the narrator significantly alludes. He wishes to say : " Scarcely had the feast of Esther taken place, when they again began to collect virgins ; and so apparently the power of the new queen had already begun to decline." It was then that the following event occurred, which was of such a character that it endangered the king's own life, but was in the end productive of greater love and gratitude on his part to Esther.

" While they were again collecting virgins, Mordecai sat in the king's gate."

Not as an official, but as an independent man, Mordecai sat in the public place before the king's palace,¹ and spent his leisure hours, as it is the custom in the East, in hearing news, making inquiries, and in conversations with friends and acquaintances. This clause is also of importance ; for not only does it represent the external circumstance, without which the discovery of the conspiracy could not have been made by him, but it also expresses the sharp contrast to the first clause, "While they were collecting." The seeking of new women could only have been directed against Esther, while Mordecai's sitting before the palace had no other intention [than to guard her interests], for before this he had nothing to do there except to be near the palace in order to assist his dear daughter with his paternal advice.

Before the narrator proceeds to give a detailed account of the episode, he restrains himself from what he has to say in ver. 20, and inserts parenthetically two memorable facts, viz. that Esther did not disclose her parentage and nationality, and that she now as punctually and carefully followed Mordecai's injunctions in all things as she formerly did when she was under his humble roof. The clause is remarkable from many an aspect. It reveals, first of all, a new characteristic of Esther herself. As the favoured queen she remained as modest and as obedient to her foster father as she was when she was first received into the harem. She still continued to do what he told her, as if she had still been in his house. The royal pomp which surrounded her on every side did not make her head dizzy. She had not forgotten that the whole royalty was not for her a matter of pleasure, but only a duty of obedience. Her interest was with the father out of doors, and not with the luxury inside.

Nothing else but his wisdom influenced her. Now, if the picture of Esther's character gains in our estimation through this parenthetical notice, its importance is further seen in this: Not merely because she did not disclose her parentage, and did not suffer herself to be influenced by any one but Mordecai, did she maintain her position at court (on account of which influential courtiers were searching for other and more manageable women); but also because the fact, concerning which more is to be spoken in detail, shows how wise the arrangement of Mordecai was. The knowledge that he acquired of the conspiracy he certainly owed only to the fact that no one had paid any particular attention to him. Had it been known that he was a countryman and relation of the queen, he would not have been able to sit so leisurely before the gate of the palace. The intriguers would have been cautious with their design. Thus wisdom rewarded the one, and obedience the other. Esther continued to be queen, because she was no less humble now than she was when only a poor orphan. She rose in power and influence, because, out of gratitude to her uncle, she did not think of either. The parenthesis is also of uncommon importance, for without it the fact of the discovered conspiracy would have had no significance and interest for our book.

Ver. 21.—בָּיִמִים הָהִם “In those days.”

Now, after the short digression, the narrator takes up the thread of the narrative. “In those days,” says he (as they were again collecting virgins, and) as Mordecai used to sit at the gate, it happened that two eunuchs belonging to the sentinels of the palace, and therefore confidential persons, made a conspiracy against the king’s life. The reason for it is not stated, but it probably was because their ambition had been thwarted and their influence had been damaged. Others sought to gain promotion in a different way, by seeking to substitute another favourite in the place of Esther; but these thought that they could only reach their aim by murdering the king, and substituting another in his place. Through the wonderful guidance of Providence, the plan of the one party must become the means of salvation from the design of the other in reference to the king and the queen. Their names were Teresh, תְּרֵשׁ, and Bigthan, בִּגְתָּן. The name בִּגְתָּן is like (s. o.), Bagoas, Bagistanes; that of תְּרֵשׁ reminds us of Ezra ii. 63); both are derived from their offices. But they were not high officials. This is shown by the qualifying words מִשְׁמַרְיָה הַסְּפָרָה, those who kept the door. Herodotus called them πυλούροι, φυλακαί (iii. 140), without whom no one could enter the castle (iii. 72). The name שׁוֹמְרֵי הַסְּפָרָה was not unfamiliar to the narrator, as it often occurs in the history of Israel when they had reached the zenith of glory (2 Kings xii. 10, xxii. 4, xxv. 18 ; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9 ; Jer. xxxv. 4, lii. 24).

Moreover, it is said that Xerxes was at last actually killed by conspirators. Artaban, the commander of his cavalry, conspired with Mithridates, his confidential chamberlain, who admitted him into the bedroom of the king during the night, and so he stabbed the king with his dagger while he was asleep (Diodor. xi. 69. 1). But this time he escaped assassination. It is emphatically told that the conspirators were watchers of the threshold, the guard at the entrance of the gate. From this it appears probable that Mordecai, who was loitering about the gate, and unnoticed by them, overheard their treacherous conversation. Josephus thinks that a Jewish slave was one of them, by the name of Barnabazus, who betrayed them to Mordecai. The Jewish commentators are of opinion that Mordecai understood their language, inasmuch as he spoke seventy languages ; and the proof they give of this is, that another man in Ezra ii. 2 is called Mordecai, whose name stands near the name Bilshan, which they take as an adjective meaning linguist. The language they spoke was the language of Tarshish, טרשיש. How they come to this strange idea can easily be guessed. The name of one of the conspirators was תרשׁ, which reminded of תרשׁישׁ, which is sometimes explained as standing for Tarsus in Cilicia. But it is curious to note that with this Mordecai the Benjamite, according to the Rabbis, a Barnabas stands in confidential and fraternal relationship, and he is conversant with the language of Tarsus, like the Apostle Paul, who also had a Barnabas for an intimate friend and companion ! The LXX. does not even mention the traitors by name, but simply speaks of them as commanders of the body-guard (ἀρχισωματοφύλακες). Josephus used a manuscript which read תרשׁ instead of טרשׁ, for he calls him Theodestes. Mordecai discovered the plot by his wisdom and by his observation, which his love to Esther inspired. Was he not sitting day by day in the square before the palatial gate for the very purpose of being vigilant, and yet to be unobserved? And when he was quite certain (^{עָמִין}) that the king's life was in danger, so that he could substantiate his accusation, and that this would not fall upon the head of Esther, he at once acquainted her with the fact. Evidently he must have kept up a continual correspondence with her, as appears from v. 20, and so the queen revealed it to Ahhashverosh. A searching investigation was immediately made, the accusation was proved, and both eunuchs were hanged on the gallows. Upon this mode of execution we shall speak farther on. The incident was a wonderful interposition of the great Redeemer of Israel, who thus already made known His name. Without this, Esther might perhaps have fallen a victim through the instrumentality of a new rival. But now she had saved the king's life. She had told him that it was Mordecai from whom she had learned the secret of the conspiracy, and he had his name duly registered in the archives; but to reward him, he had momentarily forgotten,¹ and Esther, acting on the advice of her friend, was silent on the point. He would have been exalted to high rank, had she said that he was her uncle and foster-father. But she obeyed, and said nothing. The instruments have been prepared for the hour of danger and of deliverance. The Midrash adorns the above fact with many quaint sayings; but there are some valuable thoughts among them.

According to it, the conspirators wanted to poison the king by putting a snake into his cup of wine or coffee. When they saw that this plan was discovered, they indeed hastily removed the snake; but when the investigation of the affair was made, lo, in order to save Mordecai's head, there the snake was again in the cup. The story of the snake in the cup¹ is borrowed by the Midrash from the experience and notions of the time. King Xerxes was not exactly a John, who, according to the Lord's promise to all His disciples, might drink from a cup in which a snake had full play, without being hurt. The Midrash further says of the wonderful providence of God, that the king's anger against his servants was like that of Pharaoh against his in order that Joseph might be set free from prison; and that the anger of the servants against the king happened in order that Mordecai might become instrumental in the deliverance of Israel. In answer to the question whether Mordecai was right in his intervention to save the life of such a king, the Midrash says: Jacob blessed Pharaoh, Joseph interpreted the king's dream, and Daniel prophesied to Nebuchadnezzar. The pious of Israel have always been obedient to the existing authorities, and have always done what they could for their welfare. This exhibition of loyalty, as in the case of Joseph and Daniel, so also here, became the means of the salvation of those who showed it. The king had certainly not appreciated the spirit and the sentiments of Esther. He was accustomed to his wives esteeming his life of the highest consequence. When Darius recovered from sickness, through the instrumentality of the clever Greek physician Demokedes, he sent him to the house of the women, in order that they might see him who saved his life; and they gave him rich presents (Herod. iii. 130). For the life of these women was, after the death of their king, very sad and miserable. The report of Athenaeus, that the Persian king was guarded by 300 women, has no other sense except that to none was his life so precious as to them. Ahhashverosh, indeed, rejoiced that Esther saved his life, and she gained in his estimation, and secured her position against possible rivals. But the tyrannical selfishness of an Oriental mighty king is neither diminished nor refined by such catastrophes. They are to him usual acts and occurrences that are bound up with government. Holding unlimited power over the lives of thousands, his heart is not softened nor his wisdom increased by an exhibition of dutiful love. He had not, indeed, forgotten to condemn the conspirators, but the reward due to the deliverer, and the warning lesson which the hostile assault was intended to teach him, these he had forgotten. This is evident from the narrative farther on, when it reaches its tragic height. Through extraordinary interventions, that which was prevented from happening helped to prevent other things from happening. The failure of the attempt to murder the king, and his omission to reward Mordecai, were factors in the frustration of the plan which hatred and caprice had formed. But it also proves that the preparatory steps taken by the king, as recorded in chap. iii., although they were intended to prevent similar catastrophes, yet they did not proceed from a sense of dereliction of duty and love on his part, but were entirely based upon his right of exercising his arbitrary will.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1. "After these things."

The narrator in our book has not undertaken the task of giving a complete history of Ahhashverosh. His chief object is to report the circumstances which were connected with the drama of the danger and of the deliverance of Israel. True, he gives the exact dates in which the recorded events happened, but at the same time we must remember that he does not write annals of the Persian court. He rather very ably places those events in succession after each other which have any ethical tendency or bearing upon the history, in spite of the intervals of time which lie between them. The disaster which Haman seeks to bring upon Israel is to him the hinge upon which his history turns. All these things, he implies, must necessarily have happened, in order that the plan of an angry man should be frustrated. Instead of giving us diffusive reflections, he lets the facts speak for themselves. He does not speak of the miracles which these successive occurrences reveal, but he makes it clear that Haman only becomes powerful just at that moment when the exaltation of Esther to the position of queen, and when the saving of the king's life through Mordecai had taken place, and not before.

"Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite."

The narrator reports his elevation by the king after the preceding events had taken place, but omits to indicate the ground for this elevation. Regarded superficially, there seems to be no connection between these events and his promotion, nevertheless they form the historical basis or the ladder upon which he climbed up to his high position. There is a well-known Persian tradition, that in the reign of King Vistaçpa, later Gustasp, the religion of the Avesta was introduced into Persia (Spiegel, Avesta, i. 42, 43). Although it has been questioned whether this Vistaçpa is the same as Hystaspes, the father of Darius, yet the identity of the names may be established from the fact that the house of Darius was particularly zealous for the doctrine of the Zarathustra. It is remarkable enough that we do not meet with the name Hystaspes, except in the case of the father and the son of Darius. This king says of himself, in the inscription of Bisutun, according to Benfey, p. 12, as follows: "I have again restored the temple, and the worship of the protector of the kingdom and of the gods." Xerxes also, if the few notices we have are an indication, was closely connected with, and influenced by, this religious cultus. A magus by the name of Osthanes (see Pliny, 30. 1) accompanied him on his war expedition, and was commissioned to propagate Persian doctrines, and an Iranian priest had even ordered the destruction of the temples and the images in the hostile countries. In the elevation of Haman we must therefore see an approval of, and participation in, his religious zeal. The whole activity of Haman betrays religious sentiments, and his name has a religious sound.

Haman (חָמָן) is to be derived from the wonderfully holy Haoma, or Hom, who was thought to be a spirit as well as a sacrificial potion, possessing life-giving power (Spiegel, Avesta, ii. 75). The significance of Hom in the Persian sacrificial service was at all times known (Omomi in Plutarch); and as it was connected especially with priestly functions, we may infer from this that one who bore a name which was derived from Hom, was endowed with priestly qualities. In fact the name Ὀμᾶν, Gr. Omanes (like Otanes, Azanes, Hystanes), does not occur in the classics as a name of any Persian, and only the inscription of Bisutun (Benfey, p. 14) contains the following passage: "A man named

Martiya, son of Chichikrish, who lived in Khuganaka, a Persian city, rose in the Susian kingdom, and said: ‘I am Umanish, king of Susiana.’” Though it is doubtful whether the letter “u” is in the name of Umanish, but the context shows that the name is similar to Haman. It says that a man in Shushan (where Haman lived) arrogated to himself the royal title of Umanish. And it is precisely of such a person, that we may presume he was actuated by religious motives. What enhances the probability of the identity of Haman with this person is the name of his father, המודהָא, Homdata [as in Pherendates], “the gift of Hom.” The appellation of Hom was then, like the functions of the priests, hereditary in the family. We may also assume that the third epithet of Haman which sounds as a family name, Agagite (אנגיטי), is closely connected with it. The Jewish commentators have, forsooth, woven a good deal of fantastical interpretation around this name, but which in no other point comes near to the historical truth save in this, that they give to the hatred of Haman against the Jews a religious colour. But their saying that Haman was a descendant of Agag, the king of Amalek (1 Sam. xv. 8), who descended from Esau, Jacob’s brother and enemy,—and hence his hatred of the Jews was hereditary,—cannot be proved from history, although their pointing out an historical contrast in Haman, as we have already shown, is certainly correct. The Midrash goes even so far as to give a whole list of names which form the genealogy of Haman up to Esau, but in spite of the corruption of the text, it can be seen that the names mostly arose from the Rabbinical views of the morality of this generation. First, names are given which denote “bad qualities;” then figure as the ancestors of Haman those persecutors of the Jews in the Herodian-Roman era, who are of Idumean and heathen origin.¹ The genealogy of the Targum is for this reason remarkable, because we get thereby a clue to the time when it was written ; but it does not contribute anything to elucidate the epithet Agagite in connection with Haman. In our opinion, it is quite improbable that Haman should be a descendant of Amalek.¹

For the son of a certain Hamedatha, a man whose name was derived from Haoma, must be of pure Medo-Persian descent. If the narrator had wanted to say that Haman was really an Amalekite, he would have at once written Amalek instead of Agagi. Agag was indeed a king of Amalek, but what is told of him in the Book of Samuel cannot stamp him as a type of Haman, as he rather suffered than executed judgment. One cannot also assert that the narrator, in calling him Agagite, wanted to represent him as the ethnical as well as the political persecutor of his people, as Amalek was, for

The translation according to the corrected text is : Haman the son of Hamdatha of Agagi, son of Stench, son of Robbery, son of Pilath, son of Lysias, son of Florus, son of Fadus, son of Flaccus, son of Antipater, son of Herod, son of Refuse, son of Decay, son of Parmashta, son of Waizata, son of Agag, son of the Red One (Rufus), son of Amalek, of the whore of Eliphaz, son of Esau. These are, with the exception of Lysias, a Syrian general, entirely names of Roman persecutors of the Jews ; and Antipater and Herod, who were Idumeans, and therefore sons of Esau, have a place in the ignoble roll because of their similarity of character with the rest (comp. Targum, ed. Amsterdam, 58d).

this would have been unique in Scripture. In that case, he would have explicitly named Amalek. Apart from this, it did not even occur to the interpreters to ask whether, according to 1 Sam. xv. and 1 Chron. iv. 43, which record the destruction of the whole race of Amalek, there could still be any one descended from him. But Haman does not even feel and act like an Amalekite, for he does not begin to persecute the Jews before the independent bearing of Mordecai excites his indignation. If the narrator had wanted to designate by the appellative Agagite an enemy of the Jews, he need not have added in ver. 10 the words צור יהודים, “the Jews’ enemy.” There can therefore be no doubt that the word Agagite has received the prevalent notion from the punctuation of the Masoretes.

The similarity of the letters of אָגָגִי with the name of the Amalekite king led them to this punctuation, so that by way of jest they might transfer the character of the ancient enemy of the Jews to Haman. But this change in the punctuation is the more interesting, as in all probability an honourable title was changed by it into a polemical one. For Haman bears this appellation in the first mention of him. If it is not a nickname given to him by the Jews and reproduced by the narrator, then it must be a Persian name, which is somewhat connected with the purport of the father’s and the son’s names. It is very probable that in אָגָגִי is to be found the New Persian גְּוָגֵה, Guageh, which means a man of authority and dignity, and therefore is also used as a title of honour (Vullers, Lex. i. 735). But it has also the sense of a comrade or companion, one who belongs to the same corporation, which is perhaps more characteristic, as we shall afterwards show. The LXX. reads Bοργαῖος instead of אָגָגִי, and thereby prove that they, at any rate, had not thought that he was a descendant of Agag. They seem thus to have thought of Bagoas, which was also the name of a number of royal confidants of Alexander the Great.¹

But the Bagoas were eunuchs, and Haman was not. Perhaps we may recognise this Guageh (Gogeh) in the name Gyges, who was a favourite among the retinue of Candaules of Lydia, and who afterwards became king (Herod. i. 8).

“And advanced him, and set his seat above all the princes.”

The elevation of a man at court was figuratively represented by the elevation of his seat in the presence of the king. The highest seat was occupied by the king, and the one who sat the nearest to him was the most honoured and distinguished.

When the hero Rustem was to be rewarded by the shah, we read (Firdussi, ed. Schack, p. 266),—

“And Rustem, with the adorning crown, Sat nearest to the lofty throne.”

When he quarrelled with Kai Kawus, and his friends persuaded him to remain, they promised him—

“Thy seat a throne as for a king.”

Therefore at great conferences of princes, the various dignities were displayed by the various elevations of the thrones they occupied. When the German kings came during the Crusade to Constantinople, the emperor occupied a higher throne than they.

Geiseddin Balbun, the ninth prince of the Ghurid dynasty in Delhi, permitted only those of the fifteen expelled kings who formed his court to sit on lower seats near him, who were descended from the caliphs (comp. my Kaiser und Königs-thron, p. 49). When Apollonius of Tyana came on his fabulous journey to the Indian sages (Phil. iii. 16), Jarchas sat upon a high seat, the other sages upon lower ones, and to Apollonius was offered, as a mark of special honour, the throne of Phraortes the king (17).¹ Such elevations through personal favour of the rulers were not unusual in Oriental courts, especially in times of peace, and under weak princes. It is told by Ktesias of a eunuch under Darius Nothos, that, through the favour of the king, he succeeded in getting all the power at court into his hands. So also it is told of Bagoas, under Artaxerxes II., that he and the Greek Mentor had so much ingratiated themselves into the favour of the king that they had more influence than the king's own friends and relations, πλεῖστον ισχὺσαι τῶν φίλων καὶ συγγενῶν τῶν παρ' Ἀρταξέρξη" (Diodor. xvi. 50). The elevation of Haman must surely have a special significance, for all the courtiers and guards were compelled to fall down before him and to render him homage as to a king.

Ver. 2. "All the king's servants bowed down and did reverence."

Servants of the king included all the courtiers and guards. The expression corresponds to the New Persian Gholam, of which Malcolm says (Gesch. Pers. i. 185) Gholam, or slave, was the title of the body-guard of Eastern princes. When the son of a great Persian nobleman is admitted into the guard, he claims the title of Gholam-e-shah, or "slave of the king." "Slave" was the usual title by which the rulers when angry addressed the highest officials, as pashas and grand viziers. To the demented Ibrahim, sultan of the Osmans, his grand vizier said : " You are the caliph, the shadow of God upon earth, and what enters your mind is divine revelation ; however absurd it may appear, it has a hidden meaning, which your slave¹ respects, although he does not understand it " (Hammer, v. 399). The religious power which the adulating minister the wished-for horse, and all the great and eminent men walked by my stirrups" (Hammer, Gemüldesaal, v. 71). So the Barmekide Giafar at the court of Harun was allowed to sit alongside the caliph.

¹ Aloisius Gritti was the plenipotentiary ambassador of Soliman I. in his treaties with Charles V. In the official communication of the sultan, as given in a Latin report, are the words, "Aloisius Gritti slavus meus eo proficiscitur" (Hammer, Gesch. des osman. Reichs, iii. 137, note).

ascribes in these words to the sultan is an exact copy of the flattering words which were used in very ancient times to Eastern rulers. "The important thing with us," says Artaban to Themistocles (Plutarch, Th. c. 27), "is that a king is worshipped, and is looked upon as the very image of God." The Babylonian and Assyrian princes had names which in themselves indicated the people's high reverence for them. The saying of Solomon, according to the Muhammedan legend, that a great king always includes the prophet, but the prophet does not always include the king (Rosenöl, i. 234), does not reach to the height of that which Cleo dared to say to Alexander the Macedonian (Curtius, viii. 5. 11): "The Persians did not simply out of piety worship their kings as gods, but also out of wisdom, for the majesty of the kingdom is a refuge of salvation." For this reason he also advised him to accept prostration and adoration like a Persian king. For this custom had not, properly speaking, among the Persians, and generally in the East, a slavish, but a religious sense. They did not bow down before a worldly, but rather before a spiritual power. Hence the same homage was also due to the images of the king. Philostratus narrates in the Life of Apollonius (i. 27) that all barbarians who came to Babylon were first obliged to adore the image of the king.¹ When, therefore, the king ordered that the same honour should be shown to Haman as to himself, it was a recognition that he was his alter ego. Hitherto, so long as Mordecai sat at the gate, i.e. since Esther became queen, no courtier had received such honours, though, as Plutarch reports, Xerxes had chosen his brother Ari(a)mene next to himself. Perhaps it is necessary to explain this as connected with the inherent dignity of the office of Haman, which corresponds to his name. There may be some connection between the New Persian Gogeh and the idea of spirituality in more ancient times, as Benfey (Gr. Gr. i. 134) joins the Sanscr. akkha, “pure,” with the Greek ἄγνος, which in Persian life was applied as an epithet to distinguished pious and great men, and which Burnouf (Yaçna, i. 16) finds again in the name Achaemenes. The surname Sofi, which the Persian shah, who had established his new seat of government at Ispahan, bore with his family, likewise meant “pure,” and referred to the ascetic habits of the otherwise political and warlike house, even before Ismael’s accession to the throne.

“But Mordecai bowed not down,” etc.

This refusal of Mordecai to render adoration to Haman arose perhaps from an opposite cause from the refusal of the Greeks. They considered such an act as mean and degrading, because, as the Spartans said afterwards, it is not their custom to fall down before a man (Herod. vii. 136). The Athenians punished Timagoras for performing adoration (Valer. Max. vi. 3, Ext. 2). Pelopidas nobly declined it—because he looked upon the Persian king as only a man, to whom he would in nowise render divine honour. When Themistocles was a captain in Persia, he thought it his duty to perform such homage, on the ground that it would please God who had so exalted Persia (Plutarch, Th. 27). But Mordecai had just the opposite motive for his refusal. He saw in the adoration which the king demanded for Haman, not merely an act of etiquette to a man, but an act which involved the recognition of false gods. Daniel and his three young friends submitted rather to every hazard of their lives, than to recognise the existence of any other deity but Jehovah. The word כִּרְעַ, here used, expresses the sense of falling down, as in the adoration of idols, and it is therefore not used in the history of Israel to denote polite homage paid to kings and those who are high in authority, or strangers, but the word שָׁחַת instead. It is analogous to κατέβω, Gr. κυνέω, and προσκυνέω, expressing the same act of worship. But before Elijah as a man of God the captain falls down (2 Kings i. 13).

In the time of the same prophet there were only 7000 who did not bow the knee, כְּרֻעַ, to Baal (1 Kings xix. 18). In the time of Hezekiah, he and all that were with him bowed themselves, כְּרֻעָה, and worshipped the living God (2 Chron. xxix. 29). Mordecai could not fall down before Haman as the reflex of a false lustre of a false god. For the prophetic words ring through all Israel: "To me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear."

The Persian history, Dshami, which Hammer in Rosenöl, ii. 3, quotes, narrates of a governor of Caliph Omar, when he came for the first time to Persia after its conquest, that the inhabitants according to the Old Persian manner fell down before him, as the servants of Ahhashverosh fell down before Haman. When the governor saw it, he also fell down. And as they all rose from their knees, he asked before whom they fell down. They replied, "Before thee; but thou, O prince, before whom didst thou kneel?" "Before God," said he, "to whom alone worship belongs." Thereupon Omar sent ambassadors, who forbade the people to fall down except before God; and consequently the Persian custom did not become one of the Muhammedan ceremonies. But instead of this, the Muhammedan and Osman sultans made the kissing of the hand, and especially of the garments, obligatory, as the humiliated Tatarchan when he lost his power was no longer received with pomp by the sultan, but was satisfied to kiss the coat of the grand vizier (Gesch. des osman. Reichs, iv. 644).

The Midrash has its explanations of the subject in question, which were employed in the homiletical discourses in the synagogue. According to one, Haman had actually worn an image of an idol upon his coat, for the purpose of compelling the people to worship him, and thus Mordecai the more resisted. In fact, this remark only shows that in the view of the authors of the Midrash, Mordecai's refusal to fall down arose from religious scruples. Stranger still is another glorification which they bestow upon Mordecai. Haman had really been Mordecai's servant. They were once both sent out on a military expedition. Both had a separate division to command, but Haman carelessly spent all the provision and ammunition before he could take the enemy's fort; for he relied too much on himself, and he would have been dismissed with disgrace had not Mordecai saved him. But this he did on condition of Haman becoming his slave. And therefore Mordecai refused to make obeisance to his own slave. The national vanity, as represented in this fiction of Haman being a slave of Mordecai, has overlooked the fact, that it gave to the former the character of humility and submissiveness in certain circumstances, and to the latter a want of refinement and duty towards a comrade in arms.

Ver. 3. "Then the king's servants, that were in the king's gate, said unto Mordecai, Why transgresseth thou the king's commandment?"

It is a sign that they had greater concern for Mordecai than for Haman, that they gave him timely warning, instead of at once accusing him. They called his attention to the danger before him. Not for the sake of Haman, but because it was a law of the king, which could not be transgressed without peril. Mordecai knew this, and yet remained. He could, indeed, withdraw from the conflict, by not appearing at the gate, but his love to Esther forbade it. He would not leave this post of loving duty at all hazards. But should he be killed, his loss to Esther would be irreparable. Yet his courageous faith in God triumphs over these difficulties, and he is sure that no ill will happen to him, as no ill happened to Daniel in his stedfast opposition to idolatry. He could not reckon upon escaping harm on the ground that he as a Jew refused to fall down before strange gods, nor could he depend upon the assistance which Esther might render him at a critical moment, for his whole plan, according to which he strictly bound her to be silent upon her origin, would have been frustrated; but he trusted in God, who would surely protect him, whether he fled or whether he remained at the gate. Nevertheless, the servants of the king contributed to the acceleration of the danger; and this unseemly trait is perfectly characteristic of the friendships and companionships of such worldly people. They had encouraged him every day to render homage, till at last he had told them that he was a Jew, and could not do it. When he gave them this reason for his refusal, it was because he considered it as amounting to idolatry. Naturally, the courtiers, being themselves heathen, could not comprehend his reason. It did not appear to them clear why he, because he was a Jew, should be exempted from a duty which they were obliged to perform. Certainly, they might have calmed themselves and let the matter go until Haman himself had noticed it, or until it had altogether passed into oblivion. But their exaggerated zeal for upholding the law was incited by their vexation at the stubbornness of Mordecai, and so they denounced him. What Haman had not yet noticed, they now told him in order to learn, whether a Jew had the privilege of not bowing before him. They also wanted to see whether Mordecai would remain stedfast after Haman's attention had been drawn to his conduct. They are just עבדים, servants, slaves, excited by curiosity, their pride offended, displaying slavish zeal, without any regard as to the danger to another man's life whose conscience they ought to reverence, and whose character they ought to admire. But at all events, they represent to Haman that Mordecai refused to pay him homage, only for the reason that he is a Jew. Haman learns that it is not a personal matter, but one of principle with him. Not wilful disobedience, but religious legal ground underlies his refusal. Haman had not noticed anything in particular in Mordecai hitherto, but now he pays close attention. He gives Mordecai to understand that he has his eye upon him. The emphasis in vers. 4, 5, is upon the words (אשר הוא יהודִי) : “that he was a Jew.” “And Haman saw that Mordecai bowed not down.”¹ This shows that he did not notice it before. “And he was full of wrath.” A man of refinement would have overlooked and excused it, as no personal slight was intended. But the vain parvenu was vexed that anybody should have the courage to refuse homage to him, even him (as vain men think), and to expose him to the ridicule of the courtiers (as little souls think) if he did not break down the stubbornness of Mordecai. A noble-minded man would have respected his conscientious religious scruples; but a puffed-up man, as Haman was, did not consider the person, but the principle involved in his refusal, and the ground upon which it was made.¹

Ver. 6. “But he thought scorn to lay hands on Mordecai alone.”

The haughtiness of the man was too great to be satisfied with taking vengeance on Mordecai alone. The offender appeared to him too small a person to hurl all his thunderbolts against, and yet too important a person to be left alone. He must avenge the disgrace which was so publicly cast upon him by Mordecai in the presence of the courtiers, and obtain such satisfaction for himself as may have a deterrent effect upon others. But if he called Mordecai alone to judgment, it might be understood as an act of private and personal spite, which would not redound to his honour, but would rather bring hatred and intrigue upon himself. So he lays stress on the fact that Mordecai, as a Jew, incurred the guilt of transgressing the royal decree. Looking from this standpoint, he found it easier to wreak his vengeance upon him. In this way he could conceal his personal malice under the

each other upon the lips instead of saluting. But if one of them is inferior to the other, they kiss the cheeks ; and if one of them is quite an inferior, he falls down and worships the other.”

cloak of zeal for resisting the rising influence of Judaism. He thought he could earn merit for himself by vindicating the interests of the State, while at the same time avenging his offended pride. Should Mordecai fall in the midst of a general massacre, there would, of course, be no suspicion that he met with his death for the trifling offence of refusing homage to him. For it would be said that the king simply put down the rebellion in general. There would also then be wanting an avenger and an accuser. This psychology of the hatred which brooded in Haman has undergone a manifold development in Oriental courts, where the powerful have often to be cautious in exercising vengeance, because the way to it lies always between the mood and the caprice of the autocrat. Great and small citizens have at all times sought to give vent to private hatred and personal passions under the pretext of patriotism, and of seeking to promote the welfare of the State. Many an ambitious office - seeker, who either possessed no qualifications or was unfortunate in his demands, became by this process converted from a royalist to a rebel. The offended pride of Hassan Ibn Sabbah, which was provoked by Melekshah and his Vizier Nisamolmülk, contributed to the establishment of the ancient sect of murderers, the Assassins (Hammer, Gemälde-saal, v. p. 19; comp. Weil, Kalifen, iii. 205). The Jews experienced this plentifully. The hatred which they were made to feel during 1500 years not always arose from religious zeal, but very often was occasioned by personal discord on account of some slight offence to somebody. In a speech of defence before the King of Spain, a Jew said strikingly enough: "We Jews are like mice, upon whom all throw the guilt when some one has nibbled a little cheese" (Shebet Jehudah, chap. viii. and chap. lxii.).

It was remarked before that the names of Haman might be indicative of his priestly origin. If this be so, and if we may take Haman as in some degree connected with the family of those religious persons whom the Greeks and Romans specially call Magi, then the way in which Haman observes that Mordecai is a Jew, and at once decides to strike the whole of Judaism root and branch, would be more explicable from a psychological point of view. It was consistent with the character of a Magus to direct his attention to the Jews, and their opposition to the customs of the country, in order to constitute the supposed misdemeanour of Mordecai into a principle of rebellion. Just such a person would be inclined to stir up the religious animosities of the people against the whole Jewish nation [as, alas! we have witnessed in more recent times, and that in the midst of the boasted civilisation and culture of the nineteenth century !].

If Haman had been merely a secular vizier, one would have thought that he would pour out his wrath only upon Mordecai and his family. If his refusal of homage only concerned the transgression of a royal decree, then surely he alone was the guilty party. But Haman regarded Mordecai as a representative of a religious persuasion, and therefore he wanted to destroy the whole of Judaism. He did not consider it merely as an offence against the majesty of the king, but also against the established religion of the country, and hence his great wrath. The whole perception of the dramatic conflict between the Jewish-believing Mordecai and the Persian Magus gains in clearness if we place them in sharp contrast to one another. We have shown that the name of Haman, Agagite, is a Masoretic change of the New Persian הוֹאָנֵה. The word has the meaning of "fellow-comrade," and therefore appears to be in connection with שָׁנִית, socius, consors (see Vullers, i. 414). But now the Jews, at least those of Talmudical times, call a Magus and priest of fire by the Hebrew name חַבָּר, which, in every sense of the word, means "a companion," "fellow-disciple," "comrade." In consequence of this, its signification is the same as נִזְנִית, and tash, "wise man," "learned master," "house - father." Thus it appears that in the surname

חָבָרִים¹, which Haman bore, is expressed his titular name as a member of the order of fire-worshippers and Magi, with which also his other names perfectly agree. The fire-ministers and Magi were, at any rate, hostile to the Jews down to the times of the Sassanides. With the appearance of the Sassanides began also in Persia restrictions upon the Jewish cult, because with them was completed the restoration of the Persian fire-worship (see my "Gesch. der Juden" in Ersch und Gruber, ii. 27, p. 184; and Spiegel, Avesta, i. p. 18).

The Talmud frequently mentions the hostility of the חָבָרים, i.e. the Magi, who, in contrast to the Parthians, have oppressed the Jews (comp. the passages in the Aruch, sub voce, whence Buxtorf and Hyde, relig. vet. Persar, p. 360). Therefore the Jews remember them with scorn and aversion. They explain Ps. xiv. 1: "The fool, נְבָל, says in his heart, as referring to the חָבָרים," the "companions." So also the Muhamedans usually call them by the nickname of Philiva, i.e. fools, instead of Kalivan, "fire-worshippers."

But when the Jews gave to the Magi the name of חָבָרים, it must have corresponded to a similar name which was peculiar to the whole order, and which was perhaps handed down in the New Persian נוֹאֶה. It is interesting to notice, that as this at the same time was the designation for "house-father," so also does Spiegel trace back the name Mobed, μανίπτας, mopet, to Sanscr. umâna-paiti, "house-father" (Avesta, ii. p. 15).

The name חָבָר for Magus is manifestly older than the time of the Sassanides. This is especially seen in Isa. xlvi. 9–13, where the prophet addresses Babylon in these words: "The loss of children and widowhood in their full measure shall come upon thee, despite of the multitude of thy sorceries, and the great abundance of thine enchantments" (חָבָרִךְ).

¹ Oppert quotes from the Sargonidic Inscriptions, "Countries like Agag and Arubanda in Media" (Spiegel, Eranische Alterthumskunde, ii. 247). Even if Agag should mean a country in Media, it would not militate against our view, as the Magi were considered Medians.

And further, in ver. 12: "Stand now with thine enchantments," חביריך; and ver. 13: "Let now the astrologers, the star-gazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up and save thee from the things that shall come upon thee." So, then, there is a close relation between the name חבירים with חבר, which the prophet in olden times¹ used to designate magic, and which was also included in the word societas. Indeed, this idea receives support from the fact that the Jews, acquainted with such passages as Deut. xviii. 11, where חבר is used for "enchantment," have transferred its meaning also to the verb חבר.

The prognosticators, astrologers, and Chaldeans formed a separate caste, society, and fraternity in Babylon. Diodorus says of them: "They form a society in the State similar to the priests in Egypt . . . they are famous in astrology, and very diligent in augury. Amongst them science is transmitted through the family."² The same is said of the Persian Magi. "The religious service of the Persians is like a priestly order, transmitted from father to son."³ It is therefore to be understood that חבירים, companions, was their titular name, as covenanted members, just as sodalis was the appellation of the Roman priestly associations [Titii Augustales], or as the name fratres Arvales, from frater, was applied in Rome to Christian orders in the Middle Ages, and to societies in modern times. Even among the Jews was חבר a titular name, which implied that he who bore it participated in the spiritual communion of a certain society. The name חביר received then the same general sense as Chaldeans and Magi.⁴ According to its etymology, it expressed as little what the associates did as the other names; but as all magic proceeded from the Magi, so from the knowledge possessed by the חָבֵר proceeded the formation of the word חָבֵר, which expresses this knowledge, to divine and to pronounce enchanting formulas. Thus, therefore, חָבֵר has received the meaning of magic, and חָבֵר (also in Arabic and Persian) came to signify “to know,” “to investigate;” as Knobel¹ rightly maintains we should read, in Isa. xlvi. 13, חוֹבְרִים שְׁמִים, “astrologers,” instead of הַוּבָרִים. It is not necessary to assume, with Schelling,² a mixture of these names with the deities of the Kabires.

When Origen says (contra Cels. vi. 23) that neither Jesus nor His apostles have borrowed from “the Persians or Kabires” (Περσῶν ἢ Καβερών), he indeed alludes to the famous classical name Kabires, but he means the name of the Chaberim, the Persian savants, as he can only speak of these. But when the Arabs have applied to the Parsees the name of Gheber, or Caphir, it is probable that this was because they wanted to express by this name their scorn for them, and to show that they did not consider them wise men, but infidels.³

To the special arts of the חָבְרִים, the wise men of Mesopotamia and Iran, as well as to the ancient wisdom in general, belonged horoscopy, i.e. the observation of the relations that subsist between the movements and the position of the stars, and their reciprocal influences upon the life of man.

The prophet speaks in the passage quoted above “of the monthly prognosticators of the things that shall come upon thee.” As they pretended to be able to foretell fortune or misfortune, success or failure, good or evil days, by means of horoscopy, so their science for kings and statesmen was not of slight importance. It was evidently in vogue at the Persian court. The Magi must have latterly been called Chaberim, not without reference to this science. Pliny narrates (Hist. Nat. xxx. 2), in the name of Osthanes, the royal Magus of Xerxes, that there existed a magic from the stars. The astrologers who accompanied Darius, Curtius calls by the common name of Chaldeans; but the astrological idea pervades the name and the legend of Zoroaster (Zarathustra). The star which the wise men of the East saw appear at the birth of Christ, receives its significance only when such divination is connected with the truth announced by the Magi. An instance of this is given us in ver. 7, where we read:—

“They cast the Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman, from day to day, and from month to month, to the twelfth month, which is the month Adar.”

The narrator translates the word פָּרֶן, which means “share,” pars, sors,—just as we use the word “lot” in a religious sense. The New Persian has also an analogous word for pur.¹ It is not necessary to bring the New Persian בָּאֲרָה, pars, segmentum (comp. Vullers, i. 317; Rosen. Narrat. p. 110), to elucidate the meaning of פָּרֶן. For inasmuch as the “lot” here spoken of was cast from day to day, and from month to month, and finally fell on the twelfth month Adar, it must evidently refer to the horoscope which was set up, and whose apparent indication of fortune the Greeks, as well as the Romans, called the result of horoscopy, κλῆρος, or sors. Indeed, the prophet may allude to this when he says מְוִיעִים לְחַדְשִׁים, “the monthly prognosticators” (Isa. xlvi. 13).²

It fell before Haman, i.e. “he caused it to fall,” he made observations and obtained the result. If the meaning of אֲנֵנִי is really found in נְוָנָה (with which the Sanscr. sakhja is to be compared) as a Persian expression for חָבֵר, then the knowledge of Haman in the use of the horoscope gains through this a clearer explanation. The narrator has already indicated this by the mentioning of "Haman, son of Hamadatha the Agagite," as hachaber, or אנני, המן, fire-worshipper magician.

Sors, pur, the result of setting up the horoscope, was so termed, as according to ancient ideas every day and every hour had its allotted fortune, which was suitable to the various undertakings and exercises of the will of man. How these observations were made, the ancients have left us an abundance of information. It did not merely depend upon the position of the planets, but more particularly upon their relation to the zodiacal signs, every one of which controlled a month. In reference to this, the Chaldeans, as Censorin expressly narrates, had a special era, dodecaeteris, consisting of twelve years, "which the horoscopians made applicable, not to observations of sun and moon, but to other purposes, because they say that in it revolve weather, fertility of crops, drought, as well as diseases and conditions of healing" (De die Natali, cap. xviii.). Scaliger is of opinion that this era was still in use by the astronomers of the East in the Middle Ages.¹ The years of the era had different names of animals. The first year was called Mouse, and the last had the name of Pig. What form of horoscopy it was that gave to Haman the twelfth month (the Jewish Adar) as favourable for his enterprise against the Jews, is difficult to establish. The Jewish exposition (Megilla 13b) tries to show that he found out that he could not harm Israel in any other of their months but Adar, because he knew that Moses died on the 7th of that month; but he deceived himself, as Moses was also born on the 7th of Adar.² [So it was not an unfortunate day for them after all, as the end proved.] The Midrash (93b, followed by the second Targum) is more explicit as to the reason why the other months were less favourable for his purpose. "When he came to make observations in the month of Adar, which stands under the zodiacal sign of the fish, he exclaimed: 'Now they are caught by me like the fish of the sea.' But he noticed that the children of Joseph are compared in the Scripture to the fish of the sea, as it is written: 'And let them multiply as the fish in the midst of the earth' (Gen. xlvi. 16)."

This thought did not, of course, enter Haman's mind, but perhaps he made use of the Persian customary idea, that the twelfth month is propitious for taking action against the hostile principle under the figure of serpents, by the writing of amulets which would kill them (Hyde, de rel. vet. Pers. p. 258). But surely more suitable is what Manilius, among many other things, says of the zodiacal sign of the fish: "The star does not come out at the beginning of this sign. Hateful gossip and poisonous tongues are bestowed upon men, who bring bad words to ears unaccustomed to hear them. Thus the faults of the people are blazed abroad by these ambiguous tongues" (lib. iv. 5. 574, etc.).

The narrator mentions the time when Haman made investigations concerning the lot. He says, בחדש הראשון הו-חדרש נסן, "In the first month, which is the month Nisan." It must be taken for granted that he understands by the expression, "the first month," the first Persian month, as he paraphrases the word pur by the Hebrew הנורל, i.e. the lot. Otherwise it would have been sufficient to say, in the month Nisan, for he wrote for Jews. But he wanted to specify which month it was in which the lot, according to Haman's scientific observations, was cast. Just because it was a horoscopy, it depended upon the month. The Jewish month Nisan had no particular advantage to offer for Haman's purpose, but the first Persian month had certainly its significance. The Persian new year undoubtedly tallied in ancient times with Nisan, for as an astronomer of the Middle Ages says, "Their first month always began when the sun entered the zodiacal sign of the Ram."¹ This ram is the symbol of Nisan. The specification in the book of Esther, therefore, confirms the oldest authentic notice of this description. New year was from time immemorial, in the opinion of the nations, exactly the proper time for attempting to ascertain the future. We still find in the book Sadder, a Persian compendium of doctrines (in Porta 66), that it is necessary to offer sacrifices and to feast on the first day of the new year, for the welfare of the coming year depends upon it.² The superstition which has fastened itself upon our new year, and also upon Whitsuntide, by the practice of lotteries and the seeking to ascertain the future by means of oracles, is to be traced back to the highest antiquity. It is at all events very remarkable, that on the feast of Epiphany, i.e. January 6, there was a custom to play a game with beans, by which lots were cast to elect the king of the feast. On the same day was commemorated the arrival of the Magi of the East to seek the new-born King. Again, the same day is also the chief festive day of the first week of the new year among the Persians, properly the great Neurûz.³ It is not previously mentioned that the king did not enter upon an enterprise without first casting the pur. The omission would not have appeared strange, if we had not the notice in ver. 7. And this is the more important, as with it is connected the memorable day when the whole disaster was to take place. It brings out the fact prominently, that Haman put the arts of astrology into motion, in order to secure the destruction of Israel. He had likewise set in array the wisdom of heathenism against the people and the will of God. The diabolic character of his hatred is shown in that he called the lottery of divination to his assistance. It is not so much the personal antipathy of one man towards another man, but the hostile sentiments, which make use of the hidden arts of magical calculations, in order to make sure of the enterprises that are here characterized ; the casting of the lot is here considered as an unusual mode of procedure. For it expressed the fanatical zeal of Haman, who not only applied his official power against Mordecai, but also his magical arts against the people of Israel. Therefore the report in ver. 7 is properly the central point of the whole narrative, though the author only mentions it, as it were, in a whisper. The contrivance of Haman against Israel is thereby represented, not merely as an act of tyranny against the people, but also as a rebellion against their God. Through the casting of the lot, Haman, as shall be more fully shown farther on, is placed in the rank of the magicians of Pharaoh, and near Balak, who sought by the curses of Balaam to hurt Israel. He casts the lot in the new year as though he wants to have the fortune of the star for himself against a people which, as he well knows, has a peculiar religion and an especial reverence for God, as appears from ver. 8. The drawing of a lottery at the court of the king was in itself no extraordinary thing. The wisdom of the Magi was consulted in all important affairs. This is what Pliny means when he says : "This wisdom has assumed in the Orient the command of the kings" (xxx. 1). Later times give an illustration of this. That the descriptions of Chardin¹ of the Persian court of his time are perfectly suitable to antiquity, we do not assert. But among the Oriental princes of the Middle Ages there were no polities without astrologers. Through these they made their own wishes and intentions legitimate. The Mongolian Khan Hulaku destroyed the Caliphat, because the astrologer said that the house of Abbas must fall before him.² Even the Osman sultan requested Frederick (1769) to send him three expert astrologers. But his answer, "That his astrology was an efficient army and a full treasury," it appears, did not quite please the sultan, for he then turned to the Emperor of Morocco, with the request to send him an astrologer, saying, "That although the knowledge of all secrets is only with the most high God, yet it is legitimately allowed to cultivate the knowledge of the true moments of the day and of the night."¹ But though similar astrological polities existed in the court of Xexes, yet the casting of the pur for Israel had just as distinct a significance as the arts of the Egyptian magicians and the curses of Balaam. For, not what these generally were in the habit of doing, but what they did against Israel, could be taken into consideration. The narrator does not forget to note that this happened on the first month of the twelfth year in the reign of the king. It appears that in the view of Haman this twelfth month was particularly favourable for his design.

The second Targum calls the man who assisted him in the casting of the die, Shamshai the scribe. This is one of the interpretations of which the Midrash is fond. Among the enemies who sought to hinder the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem by writing a denunciatory letter to King Artah-shasta against the Jews, was one Shamshai, the scribe (Ezra iv. 9). It is to be noticed that his name is apparently derived from the adoration of the heavenly lights, and signifies "sun-servant," as Epiphanius also knew a sect by the name "Sampsaei," translated by 'Ηλιακοί'.

On the other hand, the Midrash has another beautiful explanation: At the moment when Haman challenged the diabolical chance of the lot of the stars against Israel, a divine voice was heard exclaiming, "Fear not, congregation of Israel! If thou wilt repent towards God, then the lot will befall him instead of thee." Instructive is also the parable by which the Midrash scoffs at the vain haughtiness of Haman, who wanted to soothe his offended vanity by the adoption of destructive measures against the people of God. "He is like," it says, "to a bird which built its nest on the seashore. One day the waves swept the nest away. Then the bird got angry, and wanted to empty the sea and fill it with sand, which naturally enough caused great amusement and laughter among its companions."¹ So foolish was also Haman, who thought to annihilate the people for which God had appointed such a past and such a future. Like the little bird was also a smaller Haman, or rather no Haman, but only his scribe Shamshai, who, it says, had such a thirst for wisdom that even the Sea of Tiberias could not quench it. He drank it all out, and yet was thirsty as before.²

Ver. 8. "And Haman said unto King Ahhashverosh."

The horoscope was set up by Haman's instruction and in his presence, therefore it is expressly said, לפנֵי המן, before Haman. The king knew nothing about it. Haman only now communicated to the king what had been in his mind for a long time (ver. 8). For he wanted not only, as he thought, to be himself secure, but also to have the result of the horoscope investigation, and to be able to say in the language of Schiller, "Die rechte Sternen-Stunde ausgelesen sei, des Himmels Häuser forschend zu durchspüren" (Wallenstein, ii., vi.): "I have deciphered the right hour in the stars, by searching its traces in the celestial mansions," before coming to the king. And when he did so, his opening statement was more devilish than his former action. "The stars do not lie," but he did lie, and with fine diplomatic words entrapped the unsuspecting king. One could not better represent the art with which Haman sought to win the king, both by what he said and by what he did not say, than it is done in ver. 8.

ישנו עם־אחד—“There is a certain people.”

He does not call it by name. The name would bring their glorious history to remembrance. The name would in itself have contradicted many a subject which he was desirous to mention. It was, moreover, properly speaking, an act of treachery against the king himself which Haman had in hand; inasmuch as the protection of the Jews had been the policy of the Iranic dynasty ever since Cyrus. For it was just in opposition to Babylon, against which Cyrus revolted, that the Jews were favoured by him and restored to their land to form a faithful advanced guard. Darius adopted the same policy when the Magus Guimata (Pseudo-Smerdis) fell. It may be supposed that Xerxes would not have consented to Haman’s request even on that account. For Haman speaks as the Magi had spoken. Because he knew this, he entirely suppressed the name of the people whom he was arraigning before the highest tribunal in the land. Besides, the name Jews was extensively known. The king must have known how many of them were living in Shushan. Had he not in the name of the Jew Mordecai been saved from the treachery of his servants? Therefore Haman says ישנו עם, “There is somewhere a people.” In the other three passages where the word ישנו occurs, it has the sense of “some one, somewhat,” connected with it (Deut. xxix. 14; 1 Sam. xiv. 39, xxiii. 23). Here it expresses, besides, the scornful tone with which Haman speaks of the people which he despairs to name. He depreciates the importance of the nation, in order the more easily to attain his end. It is מפוזר ומפרק, “scattered and separated among the nations.” The people of whom he speaks has no national consolidation. It is without a national bond of union, and therefore also destitute of the means of offering a possible resistance. Repressive measures against it would require no sacrifice and might easily be taken, for as scattered and separated fragments, it has neither power nor importance worth thinking of. He speaks of the Jews as if they were gipsies, and the question had concerned a tribe, without a history, vocation, commonwealth, and connection. So, also, we find in elementary books of later times Jews and gipsies placed in juxtaposition, though it may not have been done with Hamanic intentions. But the despicable way in which Haman speaks of Israel to the king, was not disadvantageous to his design of representing them as very dangerous subjects to the State. He therefore adds, True, this people is scattered among the nations, but they are found in all the territories belonging to the king. He notices a fact whose historical truth is, indeed, of importance, and could not be gainsaid in any age. The fault he has to find with them, is a matter that concerns the whole country. And now come the principal objections to them: שונות כל העם דתיהם, their laws are diverse from those of every people. By these laws are to be understood the religious precepts which divided Israel from the inhabitants of the Persian kingdom. The word דָת is only used for the decrees of the king and of God. Of the king, because he was considered as the embodiment of divine power, and therefore his orders were looked upon in the same light as if they had been issued by God. They were irrevocable. The word occurs in the book of Esther in this and other passages only in reference to the king. Now, when such statutes of a people are spoken of, no others are meant than their religious customs, for they cannot have another king, and other precepts, דָת, cannot be used. This is evident from its etymology. But so great was the importance of such decrees as were issued by the king, that owing to their religious character they inseparably combined justice and equity. Hence in Pehlvi دَرَأَتْ, New Persian دَرَأَتْ, meant "justice," "righteousness," as well as "chance," "destiny," and "fortuitous event." The surname which the ancient Persian kings are said to have had, from Kajomors to Gustasp, was that of دَادَانْ, dadan; compounds of this word are applied as appellatives to the king and to God (Vullers, i. 779–81). To it corresponds the Greek θέμις in Homer, which is only applied to a holy statute. The oracles in Dodona were called θέμιστες Διός, “decisions given by Zeus.” Θέμις ἐστί corresponds to the Latin fas est. It is interesting to compare the various ideas formed among different nations with the statutes and customs given to men for their observance. Among the Iranians, statutes are considered as gifts (Sanscr. da, δίδωμι, dare); among the Greeks, as ordinances (τίθημι; cf. Sanscr. dha); among the Romans, as proclamations (fas is derived from fari, and lex from legere). But the Roman view comes nearer to the Hebrew idea of revealing which the word דבר, אמר (δεκάλογος), contains. However, what is here said applies only to radical words which disclose ancient divine commands in human rites.

The דָת, says Haman, which this people considers obligatory, differs from those of the whole nation. When this difference was emphasized, it amounted to a passive disloyalty to the king. For it did not fully recognise the claims of the המֶלֶךְ, the statutes of the king. It indeed regarded them as the laws of the potentate, but it denied their religious basis. Haman must have desired that the king should draw such a conclusion. For the nations of the Persian kingdom greatly differed in language, costumes, and manners. This was even a matter of pride to the ruler, that his powerful sceptre extended over such a heterogeneous conglomeration of peoples.

Herodotus, in his description of the Persian kingdom, portrays its manifold character in a very drastic manner. Haman therefore must have intimated that the difference between the Jews and the other nations is not so much in their external dress and language, as in their sharp religious contrast, in their acknowledgment of a God who is different from the gods of the other nations, who, although they vary among themselves, yet are at one in describing to the great king of Persia divine honours. But this people would not do that, because they would thereby acknowledge a principle which is against their religious convictions. This was, of course, derogatory to the dignity of the king. The king provided himself with all sorts of symbols and ordinances, in order that he (to use the words in the treatise of Mundo, which is ascribed to Aristotle and edited by Apuleius) "should be venerated as a god." But Haman is not yet satisfied. He wants to show the actual consequences which follow, when other laws are carried out than those which emanate solely from the king's will. It is not to be assumed that their different religious opinions are merely matters of sentiment, and it is sufficient that they by their actions show themselves to be obedient Persians (as, e.g., Mordecai who had saved the king's life). The consequence of such diversity of principles is that "they do not practise the king's laws" (דְתֵי הַמֶּלֶךְ אִינָם עֲשִׂים). Is not Mordecai's refusal to kneel before him a proof of this statement? But Haman, with the subtlety of the serpent, avoids mentioning individual cases of disobedience. He generalizes his accusation that the whole Jewish people, on account of their religious laws, do not respect the commands of the king.

By this he did not mean to convey that they refused to pay taxes, but he referred to their denial of divine honours to the king, which denial as a people they dared to make throughout all the territories of the kingdom. This they everywhere do with their self-willed stubbornness, and show publicly, that they prefer their own laws to those of the king. In the book of Daniel, we see that his rivals went similarly to work, and when they could not point to any omissions in his duties as a citizen, they said: "We shall not find any occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God" (בְּדַת אֱלֹהָיו, Dan. vi. 6). But his resistance to the king's law, because it was against the law of God, must cost him his life. The three pious men, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, were likewise placed by their enemies in a strait between the obedience they owed to the king's command and the worship which was due to God alone; and they were ready to die in defence of the latter. But Haman made the charge general against the whole nation, that they rejected the authority of the king altogether. Had it been a question concerning a single person, Haman would not probably have wasted one word more. "But they are many (said the king), a whole nation. Would not the State suffer by your proposal? Shall they not be tolerated because they are useful citizens?" This objection of the king, Haman at once removes. He tells him that they are a profitless people, and do not deserve any such regard. The damage which might possibly ensue by leaving them to enjoy rest (לְהַנִּיחָם) is not equal (אֵין שָׁהַג) to the profit which their removal would bring. And he hastens to add,—noticing that the king had thus far approved of his speech, and wishing to remove any financial consideration which might have seriously occupied the king's mind,—"If it please the king, let it be written that they be destroyed (לְאֶבֶד),—not merely be banished or their goods spoiled,—and I will pay 10,000 talents of silver into the treasury¹ to compensate for the possible damage."

The subtlety with which Haman tickles the conceited king, could not be more accurately presented, than it is in the specification of the sum of money which he was ready to pay for the slaughter of the Jews. It is self-evident that the king was to understand that this sum was to compensate him for the loss the royal treasury might sustain, as soon as he issued the order for their destruction. As he formerly spoke so slightly of the significance of this people, that it mattered very little to the king whether they existed or not, one should have expected that he, in order to confirm his low estimation of them, would have offered a very small price for their heads. But the cunning Haman had the avarice as well as the vanity of the king in view. The sum was, in fact, not a small bribe which the king might be induced to take, notably when Haman himself guaranteed it. Had he offered a small sum, it might have offended the king, and aroused his suspicion that Haman's only intention was to make profit by the bargain. Exactly because he so depreciated the people, and made out it was of no consequence to the king whether they lived or not, he for that very reason named a high sum. Thus he entrapped the king from two sides, from one by tempting his avarice with the large sum, and from the other by tempting his pride in implying that it must be a trifle to him to lose a multitude who were only worth the price of 10,000 talents. It must be a large sum if the offer should not offend the pride of the king, and must so excite his vanity that he should, as is shown in ver. 11, turn it into a generous gift to himself. Ten thousand talents of silver were a considerable sum for the Persian king. כְּבָשׂ (of round form, cake, as the Greek φθοῖδες χρυσίου, gold cake; cf. Böckh, Metrolog. Unters. p. 51) was a Babylonian talent which was stamped in silver in Persia; therefore Haman says he wants to let the silver be weighed or stamped. As such it was 3000 shekels and 1000 Attic drachmas in value. In a round sum, 10,000 Babylonian talents were about £4,000,000.¹ With regard to the higher or smaller value of the sum, we may obtain more decisive knowledge by comparing the contemporary value of the currency generally. The parallel notices in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah with those in Herodotus make it appear that it was a very important sum. In Neh. vii. 70, 72, we are told of the offerings which the returned captives brought for their sanctuary. They were 41,000 darics of gold and 4200 minas of silver. How exact these statements are, and how they agree with the money value given by the Greek writers, appears from the fact that the 21,000 darics which the fathers apart from the people gave, are of the same value as the 4200 minas; for five darics are equal to one mina. Now, as one talent has 500 darics, therefore the value of the whole contribution was over 80 talents, which indeed was a large sum for the poor captives of those days to raise. But it appears insignificant by the side of the 10,000 talents which Haman offered as a price for the whole people. Very important also were the valuable things which Ezra received from the king as the property of the temple. We read (Ezra viii. 26): "I even weighed into their hands (that is, to the priests) 650 talents of silver, and silver vessels 100 talents, of gold 100 talents;" total, 850 talents. To this were added 20 bowls of gold = 1000 darics, or 2 talents. So then the whole temple treasure did not even amount to 1000 talents.

Herodotus has given us particulars about the revenue which the several provinces of the Persian monarchy contributed. The provinces which paid in silver had to calculate in Babylonian talents (iii. 89). The whole sum which was collected from Babylon and the rest of Assyria (where the Jews were in great numbers), amounted annually only to 1000 talents. From Egypt came 700 talents. The sum raised in Shushan and the whole adjacent territories was not more than 300 talents. The whole income from the Persian Empire, apart from the gold dust of India, was no larger a sum than 7600 Babylonian talents in silver. To this certainly must be added the revenue of 210 talents from the Lake of Moeris, and 140 which remained in Cilicia for the payment of wages.¹ So, then, the sum which Haman offered was about equal to the whole annual income in silver from the whole empire. For, according to the standard of the Euboeic talent, which was also valid in Persia (for all, e.g., who delivered gold were obliged, according to Herodotus, to pay in the Euboeic talent), the income of the Persian king amounted, with the exception of the gold dust of India, to 9540 talents. This agreement of the offer of Haman with the silver revenue of the king has also an exegetical value.¹ Considerable numbers of Jews were only to be found in the chief States of the Persian kingdom, and for these alone Haman offered the king as much as he derived from all,—a very great sum apparently for the people which was represented to the king as worthless. But the speculation of Haman was, as already remarked, strictly correct. The greater the sum was, the more flattering it appeared to the fancy of the great tyrant to waive it. It must have been thought enormous, if Ahhashverosh should boastfully reject it. Haman knew his master well enough to guess that when he once enjoyed his confidence and smiles, matters of finance would not be so exactly weighed in the balances. The Oriental sultans were liberal in taking as well as in giving. Haman could comfortably offer such a sum to the king, for if he at all entered into the bargain of selling the Jews, he need not trouble his head any further about the money. He who, like Ahhashverosh, delivers up a people, without question, investigation, or consultation why and wherefore he should do so, does not want to make a business of them, but only to show that he is the grand lord, who treads nations under his feet; and yet the more boastful he is,—as it here appears,—the more he is in reality only the slave of his ungoverned passions. What Haman has here done, in offering the king money for the lives of others, is by no means a thing unheard of. At the court of the Seld-shukian princes, Mohamed was offered a great sum of money by his grand vizier for the life of an eminent man whom he hated — viz. Alaeddaulet Abul Hashim in Hamadan. Mohamed, who was not so generous as Ahhashverosh in giving, but extraordinarily greedy of receiving, entered upon the bargain. But when Alaeddaulet heard of it, he offered the king a greater sum for the life of the vizier, and the bigger bid obtained the victory. Of course Haman concealed his plan and hatred under the flimsy pretext of political prudence and necessity. It is a matter about a disobedient and hostile people. He reckoned upon the distrust of the king after the experience which he had gained in his dealings with the Greeks in his unfortunate expedition. Similar devices for killing all the Christians of the Turkish Empire were made several times at the court of Stamboul under Selim I. and Murad IV.; and even so late as 1770 the fanatical Mufti Perisade Osman Efendi declared his opinion, that such a massacre was a necessity. But when the Sultan Ibrahim, 1646, meditated a similar plan of killing the Christians, it was his Mufti who dissuaded him, by telling him that the stars were not favourable to his intended enterprise (Hammer, Gesch. des osmanischen Reiches, v. 390). By this opinion the right to kill all Christians was not contested. As also the right to kill all the Jews was claimed by the Roman emperors as successors to Titus, and this supposed right was commuted into the imposition of a head-tax.

Ver. 10. "And the king took his ring from his hand and gave it to Haman."

The name תְּכִלָּת which the ring bears comes from its use in the act of sealing. The seal was dipped (תְּכַלֵּת) in a coloured liquid, and then pressed upon a document. Thus the sealing received its name from the action, because a seal without a ring was not customary in the East. For the ring which was worn on the finger was the symbol of the person having control and power over his will. The seal of the king included all his power. A document which bore the impression of the royal seal (sigillum) demanded unhesitating obedience. It was considered as a divine law, and irrevocable (see chap. viii. 8). Therefore with the king's great seal was transferred royal power. Not before his dying hour did Alexander the Great deliver his ring to Perdikkas. History very characteristically narrates of the Emperor Tiberius, that with his last breath he convulsively held his ring in his clutches (Suet. Tib. 73). The Oriental legends about the peculiar virtues of the seal of Solomon, by which he had power over demons and spirits, are only figurative representations of his royal power. Only to an alter ego, or unconditional representative of the will of the king, could the royal seal-ring be delivered. This, in a modified form, became for the purpose of State administration the custom in the court of the Turkish sultans, where, for a long time, it was customary at every accession to the throne to order four imperial seals to be made, three of which, in circular form, were given to the highest officers; while the fourth, in quadrangular form, the sultan reserved for himself (Hammer, Osman. Reich. viii. 199). No one could execute the work which Haman undertook without obtaining from the king extraordinary power. By putting on the ring which the king wore on his own finger, he was thereby invested with royal authority. The narrator, in recording this act, repeats the designation: "Haman, the son of Hamedatha the Agagite, the Jews' enemy," in order to call attention to the impending calamity. The ring stamped him as the Jews' enemy, and his receiving it—remarks the Midrash, strikingly—produced a greater impression upon the Jews than the prophecies of all the prophets did, for they were led to repent of their sins. Haman is now distinguished with the name צַדְרָה הִיּוֹדִים, "persecutor of the Jews," "hater of the Jews"—a name which is applied to no one else in the O. T., but which the Jews have ever since applied to all those whose blind prejudice caused them to be Jew-baiters, and who were influenced more by feelings of fanaticism, envy, and avarice than by a desire to ameliorate Israel's condition, and to lead them to repentance and to salvation. The expression is chosen with particular reference to more ancient usage. The enemies of Israel and of their God are often so styled. The word צַדְרָה in the sense of enemy (in the singular and plural) occurs, besides, in some passages in Ex. and Deut., in Amos v. 12; Isa. xi. 13; especially in the Psalms, where שׁרֵד stands often for (comp. Ps. xxvii. 11, liv. 7, lvi. 3, lix. 11). But more probably the narrator had Isa. xi. 13 in his mind, where it is said of the enemies of Judah (צָרְרֵי יִהוָה יִכְתֹּבוּ), “They that vex Judah shall be cut off.”

Ver. 11. “And the king said unto Haman, The silver is given to thee, the people also, to do with them as it seemeth good to thee.”

The haughtiness of the king is extreme. He gives to Haman the ring, without receiving first the price of the bargain. Therefore he adds, that he makes him a present of the money. Haman should give nothing, but he can take what he likes. As Haman said, “if it please the king” to destroy the Jews, he would give him money; so now the king says he need not give anything, and may do “as it pleases him.” We must observe that the king does not say that he makes him a present of the people in order to destroy them (לְאַבְרָם), but only that he may do with them as he likes. Has he not noticed the brief hint of Haman, or does he think that this is merely his avaricious speculation? The narrator gives us an insight into the tyrannical carelessness and indifference with which Ahhashverosh listens to Haman. How readily he gives him the seal of authority to deal with a whole nation as he likes, without a single question or investigation! For he merely says, “The people (הָעָם) also is given to thee,” without mentioning them by name. He looks upon the order simply in the light of granting a favour to Haman. What can scarcely excuse him is his confidence in Haman, in that he believes that Haman is patriotic in his declaration that the people (הָעָם) are really dangerous to the State. It is the peculiar character of Oriental tyrants to have too much confidence in their ministers. The more a ruler is careless and capricious and absolute in power, the more boundless is his confidence in persons whom his autocratic will has raised to high offices of State. Of the noble Giafar the Barmekide, it is told that he possessed such power, that he first spontaneously adopted and executed the most important affairs, and then reported about them to the caliph, who merely used to say, "All right, Giafar." This gave rise to the mocking verse which Abu Pharaon made upon Harun, and which, according to Hammer, is as follows:—

"Thou thinkest that thy hand rules the empire ;
Thou art mistaken indeed ;
Thou art nothing but the puppet, whose wire
The hand of the great man does lead."

But Ahhashverosh is not in the hands of a Barmekide, but in those of a revengeful man.—At the conferences which the ambassador of the Hungarian pretender to the throne, Zapolya, had with Ibrahim Pasha in 1533, the latter boasted of his power, and said, "My master has also two seals; one he wears himself, and the other I wear; for he does not want to see any difference between himself and me" (Hammer, Osman. Reich. iii. 129). Against this Ibrahim the Jews complained, as against a second Haman; and they rejoiced in like manner when he fell (Joseph ha Cohen, Dibre khayim, p. 103, ed. Amsterdam).

Ver. 12. "Then were the king's scribes called in the first month, on the thirteenth day."

This date must have been perfectly known to the narrator, for the letters of the king must have been prepared from the day of the first month to the corresponding day in the twelfth month in which the execution was to take place. But this was the thirteenth of Adar, as is expressly stated in chap. ix. 1. And as the edicts were issued to the Persian authorities, it must have been in accordance with the Persian calendar, with which the Jewish must have been brought into harmony. It must therefore also be assumed that the thirteenth of the first month agreed with the Jewish. But was it without any significance that Haman should choose the thirteenth day of the month for the starting-point of his diabolical hatred? He had cast the lot from day to day in order to find out the month in which he might strike the Jews. The thirteenth day of every month was called by the Persians Tir, and this has still in the modern Persian the meaning of "lot," "share," and "part" (Vullers, Lex. Pers. i. 486). We cannot refrain from other considerations which throw light upon the choice of the thirteenth day. It is necessary to remember that beside other four months of the Numa which have thirty-one days, the ides of the Roman calendar falls upon the thirteenth, and, with regard to the full moon, the time of the month was reckoned as so many days before or after the Ides (cf. Ideler, Handb. der Chronol. 239). So also it is known that Macrobius (lib. i. cap. 15) adheres to the explanation that "Idus signifies the day which divides the month, for iduare means in Etruscan the same as dividere." The full moon divided also the old Indian months into two parts—the bright part was called cuklapaxa, and the dark part krishnapaxa (see Lassen, Ind. Alterthumskunde, i. 824, etc.). Likewise, we find in Persian dictionaries that the planet Mercurius was called by them Tir. But concerning Mercurius-Hermes the ancients had, to a certain extent, the notion that he was the god of light of the lunar year. It was thought that Isis, the Egyptian moon, was descended from Hermes, and that Hermes has his seat in the moon, and goes about with it in its rotation. He has also added the five leap-days to the lunar year, and he, as is elsewhere more fully told, liberated Mars, i.e. Ares, who was chained in the thirteenth month, whereby the arrangement of the leap month (among the Jews, the second Adar) is indicated (see my Drackenkämpfe, p. 65).

The connection of the thirteenth day with the planet Tir may yet be instructive from another aspect. It is thought that Tir is nothing else but a part of the compound tistrya, the star Tistar, which the Parsees have ever invoked as the most illustrious and mighty (comp. Spiegel, Avesta, i. 273), which notably gives rain. But it appears to me that the very name Zarathustra, in a reversed form, means "the son of the star." It is undoubtedly this star which the gospel tradition knew as the star of the Magi, the Persian wise men. Then the tradition would also be remarkable, because the arrival of the Magi at Bethlehem is assigned to January 6, and this was reckoned as the thirteenth day from the 25th of December, the assumed birthday of Christ, as it still goes in modern times by the same name of the thirteenth, in reference to the three kings (Melchior, Caspar, and Balthazar), among the people of North Germany and of the Netherlands.

However, there is something more certain and sure. If we may believe that the designation of the thirteenth day by the name of Tir had reference to the full moon, we should rather decide for the connection of its significance with Tir, "an arrow," which was contracted from tigr (comp. Tigris, tigra, τόξον, τίξευμα). Pliny says the Medes call Tigris an arrow (see Bötticher, Arica, p. 28). The arrow is an ancient emblem of the moon as well as of the sun (hence of the moon and sun-gods). Even the name itself of the fourth month, which is the same as of the thirteenth day, viz. Tir, receives an explanation from this, not so much, of course, according to the later Persian calendar, where the year began with spring, but after a computation of time, of which the year began in September, which was so much in use in the first Christian centuries in the East, that it became the official era in Constantinople (Ideler, ii. 359). In this era the fourth month corresponds to the zodiacal sign Sagittarius, whose symbol is the arrow, or, as the Jews call it, "the bow." The constellation of Sagittarius appears in December, hence the arrow-throwing god of the Lycians, when winter came, hid himself in Patara.

All this undoubtedly throws much light upon the intention of Haman to destroy the Jews on the thirteenth of the month. The arrow is the symbol of death, of sickness, of disgrace, and of blasphemy. Poisonous words are compared to arrows (Ps. lxiv. 4). False tongues are called deadly arrows (Jer. ix. 8).

The apostle speaks of the fiery darts of the evil one (Eph. vi. 16). In a similar figurative sense the Greeks used the word lōs; and in Persian “to shoot one with an arrow” means, to wish evil to any one, or to slander him (see Vullers, i. 483).

The importance of the arrow and the bow in the Persian kingdom is well known. A coin bore the image of a bow, and an archer hits better than an edict. The bow was manifestly the symbol of the king himself, and represented his victorious and ruling power like the sun, hence the Persians were depicted upon the coins as standing with the extended bow, ready to shoot (Vullers, Arsac. Imperium, i. p. 50, Paris 1728, etc.).

On the day of the arrow, Haman sealed a death warrant against unprepared Israel.

“And there was written according to all that Haman commanded unto the king’s satraps, and to the governors that were over every province.”

Haman had received the authorization from the king, and “it was written,” not, “they wrote,” for the writers were only instrumental in the act, and wrote, so to speak, what the grand vizier dictated. He caused these letters to be addressed to the אַחֲשְׁדָרְפָנִים. That we are to recognise in this word, both according to the sound and sense, what is known from classical authors as satraps, or satrapa, satrapes, there can be no doubt. The Σ, comp. σύν and ξύν, is reproduced here by ח, as in אַחֲשְׁוֹרֶשׁ, for the Ξ in Xerxes. The א is, besides, only a Semitic prefix; therefore the form of Ἐξατράπης for satrap, by Theopomp, can be recognised as Semitic pronunciation (comp. Pott, Etymol. Forsch. i. lxvi.). In a similar manner the Jews have reproduced later Greek words which begin ξ by appending an א, and by בם, to which corresponds ח here; or ξενός by אַכְסָן, and ξύλινος by אַכְסָלִין. — Likewise, it is certain that אַחֲשְׁדָרְפָנִים perfectly corresponds to the Old Persian Khshatrapawan, as it was read upon the inscription of Bisutun by Benfey (comp. Die Pers. Keilinschrift, p. 18), and, in fact, we may read אֲחִישׁוֹרְפּוֹנִים. It means the administrator of a government (khshatra, domain, and pawan, according to Benfey, from the Sanscr. pā, to govern), as Herodotus calls satrapies ἀρχαῖ. The second part of the word פָּנוּם (sing. פָּן or פָּנָה) is doubtless found in the modern Persian Ban (بن), possessor, commander. The Greek form teaches that Khshatrapawa was also pronounced Ksshatrapa. After the fall of the Old Persian monarchy there were, properly speaking, no more satraps. The different Oriental kingdoms have given different names to their governors. When we find the old word שָׁרֵף, sitrap, in Persian dictionaries, it looks as a reintroduction of the Greek name into the Persian. Under the caliphs the governors of provinces were called Wali, or sometimes Amil, as Hammer remarks (Länderverwaltung unter dem Chalifat, p. 11), and Emire or Nabbe (pl. newab, whence in a maimed form, Nabob) were the names of representatives.

But Haman did not only write to the satraps, but also to the פָּחוֹת, governors of single districts. There were twenty satraps of the king (see ver. 1); but in the several satrapies were medinoth, i.e. revenue districts, to the number of 127, including Persia proper. At the head of these stood the פָּחוֹת, and therefore the first were entitled “the satraps of the king,” i.e. governor-generals; while of the second it said, “who were over every medina or district.” Now we must remark something about the meaning of the name פָּחה, pl. פָּחוֹת or פָּחוֹות. It was not only a name of a provincial administrator in the Persian, but also in the Assyrian and Babylonian Empires. The most ancient notice of this name we find in the kingdom of Solomon. Nehemiah held the office of a פָּחה in the Persian kingdom. That this office consisted in collecting the taxes may be seen from Neh. v. and 1 Kings xx. 24. To explain this very extensively used word, it is necessary to compare it with ancient Greek notices, for it must seem strange that satrap had become Grecised and πάχητες not. Now we must remember that Hesychius uses πάχητες, “rich,” “eminent,” in the same sense as Herodotus speaks of the πάχες as the aristocrats of Naxos (v. 30), the eminent men of Aegina (vi. 91), and of the rich Sicilian Megareans (vii. 156) as πάχες. To the same effect we read in 1 Kings x. 15, that Solomon received gold from the kings of the mingled people (or of the West), and from the rich פְּחֻתָּה הַרְזֵן; which cannot in the strictest sense mean governors of the country, as they were not called so in Judea (see 1 Kings iv.), but must likewise be understood as a general name for the rich and the eminent of the country. Why Thenius (Bücher der Könige, p. 169) should conclude, from the mentioning of this name, that this chapter is of later date, is difficult to see. The connection of פְּחֻתָּה in a figurative sense with παχύς, which has also the natural meaning of fat, has nothing astonishing in it. It is exactly in the nature of the Oriental dialect to associate riches and eminence of a person, in a figurative way, with the size and appearance of his body, and to express the two ideas by one word. The Psalmist calls the mighty of the land דְּשִׁנֵּי אֶרְץ, i.e. "the fat ones of the land" (comp. Isa. v. 17). In like manner is this the case with מֶশֶׁב (comp. Judg. iii. 29; Isa. xxx. 23). It has its analogy in the Greek παχύς, at least according to Pott (Etymol. Forsch. ii. 221), Sanscr. bahu, large. Hesychius has the gloss βαγαῖος μέγας, πολὺς ταχύς. It is evidently to be read παχύς, and refers to similar forms. פְּחֻתָּה is still to be recognised in the modern Turkish pasha, formerly written basha, bassa, and was also a general title of honour which was bestowed upon learned men (Hammer, Osmann. Reich. i. 56). And what is here remarkable is, that in the placing together of satraps and pashas in the book of Esther, we have the ancient Oriental designation of governors side by side with that given by the modern Moslem State (probably the last of that description).

The State secretaryship of the great king of Persia was evidently a very extensive institution, for the many nations were not managed and governed with uniformity after one single scheme; they were allowed to have their own particular language and customs; the orders which were addressed to them from the throne were sent to them in their own language and writing. It is emphatically stated that every province and people received the letters in its own peculiar writing (כתבה) and language (בלשנו). This is explained by the fact that they were not merely directed to the satraps who were Persians, and to the inferior governors (פחוות), but also to the princes (שרים), who belonged to the people themselves. For as the officers of the first rank were called governors of the king, and of the second rank pashas of the provinces, so these were called princes of the people (בָּנֵי). Indeed, the contents of the letters concerned them the most; for, to a certain extent, it was a call for a united national war against one people that was scattered among them all. Haman in his diabolical subtlety did not merely write to the satraps, lest he should provoke disapproval, as it would have appeared to them as an arbitrary act. Nor did he write merely to the administrators of finance, lest these should demur on the ground that the exchequer would suffer by it; but he specially wrote to the chiefs of the nations, to inflame their local popular antipathies against the Jews. The bureaucratic board, which was instituted for the better management of local affairs, and for the instruction of the people, when measures were transmitted to them in their own language, should become the instrument in his hand of exciting hatred and passion. Thus does the abuse of power change the best organizations into instruments of death. It is not the institutions and constitutions of a country which secure prosperity to the people, so much as the spirit which pervades the hearts of the rulers who put them in motion.

Ver. 13. “And letters should be sent by posts into all the king's provinces.”

The actual despatch of the letters is not yet told in vers. 12 and 13. The former speaks of their style, and the latter of their contents. The sending out of the letters is recorded in ver. 15. The words, the letters to be sent (תִּלְשַׁׁךְ, Niphal Inf. absol., which occurs only in this place), are connected with ver. 14 and explanatory of it. The runners (הרצים) were the royal post. "Nothing in nature," says Herodotus (viii. 98), "surpasses those messengers in swiftness. For as many days as the journey would occupy, so many men and horses are provided, one man and a horse for each day's journey, and neither snow nor rain, nor heat nor night, can hinder any of the runners from finishing his course with the greatest speed. The rider transmits his message to a second, and the second to a third, and so on, until it reaches its destination. This running course of the riding messengers the Persians call Angareion." The messengers themselves were called Angaroi. The word אנרגה, letter, which occurs in chap. ix. 29, is therefore hardly to be explained from a Hebrew root, but must be taken as a contraction of אנגרת. The modern Persian clearly shows this in the words engare, engariden, a "writing," "document," "codex" (though in Vullers it is used only in the abstract sense of thinking). The Talmud Erubin 62a, gives the Persian names of letter-carriers מוחרקי and אברגני, and so the first is clearly explained from מוחך, Arab. paper (see Freytag, iv. 216), by the modern Persian Mahar, a seal.

The second name, Rapaport (in Erech Millin, p. 6) explains from angari; but this is a mistake, for it is to be read אברדי, from the Persian berden, to carry. In Arabic we have still the name of a letter-carrier, بريده, tabellarius (Freytag, i. 106).

"To destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish, all Jews, both young and old, little children and women."

The contents of the writing were to the effect that all Jews should be totally exterminated; and the expressions used were evidently chosen to convey the climax of cruelty. First the command is להשמד, to destroy, i.e. their communal institutions, their domestic peace, their welfare, and their property. But this is not yet enough, so it is followed by the more cruel word להרג, to put them all to death at the edge of the sword. But lest any official might out of pity let some of them escape, another more revolting expression is added, וְלֹא בָּרֵךְ, “and to cause to perish,” all without distinction of sex or of age. When Haman first made his proposal to the king, in ver. 9, he used the word לֹא בָּרֵךְ, to lose them; but he did not explicitly say that he meant to kill them, for he would have attained the object of his request if they had only been banished from the country. But lest the provincial authorities should interpret this ambiguous expression in a mild way, he specified the manner in which he wanted them to be destroyed, namely, by slaughter. Some commentators have thought it so improbable that such an edict should be issued, that they have thrown doubt upon the genuineness of the whole book. Such critics only displayed their complete ignorance of history and of the spirit of Oriental rule. Attention had rightly been called to the misdeed of Mithridates king of Pontus (Grot. in loc.). The manner in which he ordered the Romans to be slain is literally the same as the one narrated in our book. Appian (xii. cap. 22) reports: “He sent secret orders to all the satraps and the mayors of cities, that they should within the space of thirty days fall upon the resident Romans and Italians, upon their wives and children, and upon all freemen of Italian origin, and kill them, and throw them away unburied, and take their goods and possessions, partly for themselves and partly for the King Mithridates.” . . . “These secret orders Mithridates sent to all at the same time. When the appointed day came, there was wailing and lamentation in the whole of Asia.” Mithridates was also an Oriental tyrant, and acted in a measure according to old tradition. It was to him an act of vengeance as well as national policy, which Haman likewise in his plan presented before the king. But the Romans were a mighty people who had penetrated Asia victoriously, whilst the Jews formed, throughout the whole country, subjugated peaceable communities. Mithridates therefore was the executioner of national vengeance, but Haman sought to avenge his own personal spite. For the latter fearful motive has also many analogous examples in the Orient. Specially cruel appears the deed of Alaeddin Khiljy Sultan (in the beginning of the fourteenth century). Some Mongols whom he had dismissed from his service were accused of treachery, and in consequence of this he caused all Mongols, it is said 15,000, to be slain in one day. Mohammed, the victorious Shah of Chowaresmier (in the beginning of the thirteenth century), had conquered Turkestan, and had given to the conquered Osman Khan, who was uncommonly handsome, his daughter in marriage. But this man, being inwardly as coarse as he was outwardly fair, had no sooner settled in Samarkand, than one fine morning he undertook a massacre of all the people of Chowaresmier, so that his own wife, the daughter of Mohammed, scarcely escaped. Of course he himself did not escape vengeance afterwards (comp. Hammer, Gemäldeaal, vi. 172 and iv. 197). Shah Abbas of Persia, when he no longer needed to tolerate the disobedience of the inhabitants of Ghilan, issued an order in 1634 that all the people should be killed (Malcolm, ii. 30). European history also is not without such examples of tyrannical cruelty. Prominently among all is the fearful sanguinary St. Bartholomew night. For those who were then killed were not strangers, but Frenchmen, friends and guests. Yea, even those who had been invited to weddings were cut off without pity. Here the king himself and the princes imbrued their hands in blood. They were more bloodthirsty and guilty than Ahhashverosh, who was deceived by another, and misled by his own arrogance.

Ranke, in his French History (i. 332), says that about 3 o'clock the alarm-bell began to ring; then the people rushed everywhere into the houses of the Huguenots, in order to kill them and to rob them of their property, crying, "It is the king's will, and he has commanded so." Orders were given by word of mouth, and these were carried with the speed of lightning from city to city to excite fanaticism. According to moderate statistics, in Paris alone 5000, and in the country 20,000, people were massacred.

The Jews were scattered in all the provinces of the empire (Joseph. Jewish Wars, vii. 333), but they lived everywhere together in separate communities, as was the peculiar custom in ancient times. The various nationalities of a city did not reside promiscuously, as in a modern city, but in separate quarters. For this reason jealousies were more frequent, and hatred and passion were more easily excited against each other. In the cities where Greeks and Syrians dwelt together strife never ceased. It could not therefore be difficult for Haman to excite fanaticism and avarice, either of which is always, even without external impulse, the source of the other. Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 9. 9, gives a remarkable example of this from Seleucia. The Greeks and the Syrians were always quarrelling. But the former were generally defeated, because the Jews took part with the latter. "Now when the Greeks had the worst in this sedition, and saw that they had but one way of recovering their former authority, namely by preventing union between the Jews and the Syrians, they every one discoursed with such of the Syrians as were formerly their acquaintance, and promised they would be at peace and friendship with them. Accordingly they gladly agreed so to do; and when this was done by the principal men of both nations, . . . they fell upon the Jews, and slew about 50,000 of them; indeed, the Jews were all destroyed, excepting a few who escaped," etc. A similar quarrel arose at Caesarea between the Jews, the Greeks, and the Syrians as to the ownership of the city, in which the Syrians played a double game; and though overcome by the Jews, the latter were at last severely punished by the Romans (Joseph. Jewish Wars, ii. 13. 7). There is a history of the entire extermination of the Jews in Persia under Abbas II. in the year 1666. It is not authenticated, but it may possibly be an imitation of the narrative in our book (see Schudt, Jüd. Merkwürdigk. i. 1. 26-32).

"In one day, even upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month Adar."

It may seem strange that Haman should have left the governors such a wide space of time for the execution of the order, but it was because the horoscope had cast the die for the month Adar ; and this turned out to the salvation of Israel. On the other hand, a long interval was desirable for himself, as it would leave the various executioners time to prepare for decisive action on the appointed day. The objection to this, that the Jews might in the meantime have fled or provided themselves with places of refuge, does not hold good, for whither could they have fled ? In such a case the whole extensive empire would have been their universal prison. And if the communities had desired to emigrate, would they have been suffered to do so ? And even if they had been willing to forsake their faith and nation, would they not have been hindered from doing so ? For when one wants to destroy a person, he strengthens him in tenacious adherence to his religious system out of hatred. The command of Haman was violent and cruel enough before the actual deed. He played with them, as the cat with the mouse which she has already caught. He let them have breathing time, during which they should prepare to die, to lament their fate, and to fall into despair. The horoscope had decided for Adar. In the 13th of the first month, the day of the arrow, the decree was issued, and till the 13th of Adar, i.e. a whole year, the angel of death was hovering over Israel, and pierced their souls before he touched their bodies.

"And to take the spoil of them for a prey."

That שׁוֹבֵד represents war booty is well known (comp. my Comm. on Judg. p. 60). It is therefore usually connected with שׁבָד, to plunder. Pott (ii. 153), who compares it with ἀρπάζειν, is surely right, rather than Benfey. The writing of Haman regards the Jews as enemies of the country, whose subjugation is determined upon, and whose hostility is of so enormous a nature, that slavery would be too mild a punishment for them. The Persian monarch had power enough to deal as he pleased with those who were under his dominion, and of whose power of resistance he had nothing to fear.

The Jews have experienced a similar fate in their subsequent history, if not in being threatened with death, at least in having their property confiscated. The German-Roman emperor used to claim the right, during the Middle Ages, of levying a head-tax from them, on the ground that he was the heir of the conqueror of Jerusalem, and could do with them as he liked. The Emperor Charles IV. said expressly, in a rescript: "All the Jews belong, themselves personally and their possessions, to our exchequer, and are in our hands and power, so that we are authorized to deal with them according to our pleasure." It was again a relic of the old Oriental law of conquest, which was upheld against the Jews in Christian States, and aggravated by religious sentiment, such as we find in Haman's order, when Albert Achill, the Margrave of Brandenburg, published the following political law: "When a Roman king or emperor is crowned, he has everywhere the right to take the goods of the Jews that are living under his dominion, and also to take their life, and to kill a certain number of them" (see my "Geschichte der Juden" in Encyclop. Ersch und Gruber, ii. 27, p. 86).

Ver. 14. "A copy of the writing to be given out for a decree."

The explanation of פָתַחַנְן is not without certain great difficulties. It does not appear that the compound פָתַחַנְג, "royal bread" (Dan. i. 5), Zend. paiti, Sanscr. pati, Pers. pād = "king," "lord," and בְּנֵי, "bread," comp. Greek βέκος, bread, throws any light upon it. Nor can it be compared with פָתַחַנְם, "word," "edict," which is in Persian פִתְחָמ, פִתְחָמִים, for the two words have no relation to each other. It is certainly like פָרְשָׁנָן in Ezra. With regard to its meaning, we find a difference of opinion already among the oldest commentators.

Some of them thought that the two words in Esther and in Ezra are of different meanings, which is surely not the case. The LXX. has rendered the word pathshegen in Esther by antigraphon; hence came into Lexicons and into most modern versions the word "copy" for it. But this is clearly an hypothesis of the LXX., for it renders parshegen by diasaphesis and diatage, which corresponds to the paraphrase of the Targum, diatagma. But it is also evident that pathshegen and parshegen are inseparable, because the second half of the compound never occurs for "writing" or "copying." In the passages in Ezra there is no mention of a copy, as they only speak of one letter. The satraps could not have sent a copy, but the original, to the king. So also in our passage, the word cannot be understood in the sense of a copy. We must therefore take antigraphon in the sense of "contents," "purport," "tenor," as Jerome rightly renders it by "summa." To obtain this meaning, it is not necessary to adduce the modern Persian בְּהַרְשָׁת, Arab. פְּהַרְשָׁת (Castelli, Lex. Syr. p. 738; Vullers, ii. 698).¹ Other Orientalists, as Oppert and Gildemeister, have thought that the word is composed of the Old Pers. fra (Sanscr. pru, Lat. pro) and ahanhana (= ganghana), which means order (see Fürst, Lex. ii. 244). At all events the syllable נְשָׁ demands consideration. It may dialectically be compared with signum, whose original idea was likewise "mark," "character," and "contents." Pott hit upon a good idea when he reminds us of a Sanscr. form, sangna (cognitio) (Etym. Forsch. i. 183). Signum is, in fact, nearly related to γνώσκειν, with which the Zend. znā, Sanscr. gna, cognoscere, are connected. Parshegen and pathshegen cannot be better rendered than by "intelligence," "observation," "contents of a letter." Only in the sense of argumentum, cognitio, could the Targum translate מִכְתָּם, Ps. Ix. 1, and מִשְׁנָה, Deut. xvii. 18, by parshegen; but for the latter, other editions have merely parsha.—The contents of the writing to the authorities was published (גָּלוּ) to the populations, in order that they might be ready for the day of the execution. These were no private instructions to the authorities, but rather open orders to the people. The intention of the publicity was in order that the Jews might be prevented from a possible flight. Thus the prospect of the coming event increased the hatred and mistrust of the heathen against them, severed all the ties which had hitherto held them together, and extinguished every humane feeling of pity in the breasts of the people, by hardening their hearts during this long interval of respite. The tyrannical command caused the Persian people to prepare themselves as for a feast. They were to provide themselves with weapons, and to be ready and eager for the prey.¹ Fanaticism and avarice do not need much time to be inflamed. But Haman thought that the more the idea was held out to the people that on a certain day they would have a chance of robbing the Jews, the more they would calculate upon it as sure. Men must be prepared for joys and for sorrows, for benevolence and for hatred, in order to drink of their cup to the brim.

In ver. 15 may be seen how vividly graphic, and yet how plain, is the description of the narrative. While the messengers run—for they transmit a royal order (therefore hamelech)—the command is published in Shushan. What a dreadful command! Life and property should be taken from hundreds of thousands, parents should see their children killed before their eyes, and children should stand as silent and helpless witnesses of the slaughter of their parents; and while this is being proclaimed, Ahhashverosh and Haman sit down at the table and drink. Just now an arrow is shot, giving the signal for the butchery of thousands, and Haman sits silent at the table of the deluded and fickle king.

Wine flows abundantly into the cups, but the numberless tears which flow from many dim eyes are forgotten. It is not more tragical in Shakespeare's Richard III., act iii. scene 1, where Glo'ster is represented as inciting to acts of new atrocity, and saying to Buckingham, "Come, let us sup betimes, that afterwards we may digest our plots in some form." For the banquet of Ahhashverosh gives less the appearance of a plot than of the malicious triumph of a treacherous enemy.

"But the city of Shushan was perplexed."

The accustomed explanation of the word נבוכה cannot easily be adopted. Commentators have generally followed the LXX., which renders it by "ἐταράσσεται," "the city of Shushan was horrified," deriving the word from the root בָּקַע, which means "rolling," "turning," and is cognate with אָבֶק and הָפֵך. Jewish grammarians have given occasion to this interpretation (see Kimchi's אוצר השರשים, p. 72). On the other hand, the predominating ancient Jewish opinion on the word was, that it is derived from בִּכְהָה, "to weep;" so the second Targum, etc. Of course it was thought that the weeping refers to the resident Jews alone,—an opinion which Jerome followed, for he says, "Cunctis qui in urbe erant flantibus;" and another scholium has the word "Judaeis" instead of cunctis. And the LXX. also renders in other passages forms of words which are likewise derived from בָּקַע by κλαυθμός, "weeping," as, e.g., Joel i. 18; Micah vii. 4. But it is necessary to limit both significations, as they are due to the homiletical expositions of later Jews, and both are untenable objectively. The word nevucha ("perplexed") cannot apply to the Jews, for we read only in chap. iv. 1, "Now when Mordecai knew all that was done." Only now commences the description of the effect which the publication of the decree had produced upon the Jews. Apart from this, it would be extraordinary to intimate that the Jews are meant by the word "city," when iv. 3 expressly relates that wherever the report of the decree came, “there was great mourning among the Jews, and fasting and weeping.” But if, as is undoubtedly the case, this is predicted of the whole city of Shushan, the question arises, why should nevucha be taken in a sense which implies that they were horrified, amazed, and confounded at the event which had actually been ushered in? Did it come all of a sudden upon them, that it took them by surprise? When the king had long before placed the prospect of plunder before them, it can scarcely be supposed that when the longed-for day had actually arrived, the people were smitten by feelings of compassion for the poor innocent Jews. The first Targum foresaw the objection, and tried to meet it by the remark, that the city got confused by the discordant, tumultuous voices that were heard, of joy on the part of the heathen, and of lamentation on the part of the Jews. But in ver. 15 there is only expressed the deeds and the behaviour of the heathen against the Jews. Then in chap. iv. comes the contrast afforded by the description of the misery it had produced among the Jews. In נבוכה, therefore, there can only be intimated a parallel to the drinking of the king with Haman. When Naomi returned with Ruth to Bethlehem, we are told “that all the city was moved about them” (מִנְהָג), i.e. her return in such a poor condition, accompanied by her young daughter-in-law, excited wonder and gossip, but does not necessarily imply that feelings of sympathy were aroused. In the same sense we must take the word nevucha. The edict of Haman did not arouse compassion towards those against whom it was directed, but formed only a subject of gossip and conversation. While the decree was issued to kill thousands of Israel, “the king and Haman were merrily drinking wine, and the city of Shushan was full of gossip.” I think that נבוכה may be derived from a form of נבּה cognate with נבּח (in the onomapoetic meaning of latrare), “to bark.” From the Gk. Βάβω, βαβάξω, “to prattle,” usually in a secondary bad sense (fut. Βάξω), comp. Odyss. viii. 408, ἔπος βέβακται, from which Βάβαξ, $\betaαβάκτης$, “gossip,” “crier,” are derived (Suidas, etc.). It is certainly the onomapoetic form, and it has doubtless an affinity with the French babil, babiller, and the English babble. Again, בְּבָבָב may be compared with it, because the בְּ is only a prefix peculiar to Hebraisms (see my Comm. on Judges, p. 120).

The condition of Israel was sad in the extreme. Their annihilation was impending,—their enemies were drinking,—and their neighbours were gossiping. Where else were they to seek help, but in repentance towards the living God!

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1. "Now when Mordecai knew all that was done."

He got to know, not only that which was evident from the published edict, but also the whole transaction of Haman with the king (see ver. 7). The order to the city of Shushan declared perhaps only what should take place there on the 13th of Adar, but he knew that Haman's plan made provision for the destruction of the Jews in general. The resentful vizier had not told the king what was the design of his hatred, but the courtiers suspected it (iii. 3); and it must have reminded Mordecai, and touched him to the core. The more he got to know the whole condition of things, the greater was his terror. It was not a mere caprice of the king, but a systematic, premeditated plan. If at any time he had cause to weep and repent, much more now. There was only one friend left who could help in this extremity, God alone; and before Him confession of sin, and heartfelt supplications must be made.

The Midrash has for the explanation of the words, "and Mordecai knew all," invented a heavenly scene, which as a homily may not have been without effect upon the synagogue. The things which had come to his knowledge were not human, but divine. The prophet Elijah had informed him of the accusation of Satan against Israel, that they had transgressed the law and worshipped idols. In consequence of which, judgment was decreed. But the prophet Elijah called upon the patriarchs to come to the rescue, and Moses had advised, that inasmuch as judgment had not yet actually gone forth, it was yet time for Israel to repent of their sins; and if they did so, the sentence of condemnation would be revoked. Elijah came to make this known to Mordecai. It is clear that exegesis does not gain anything by the contribution of this legend. Mordecai did not need that Elijah should come and instruct him in the duty of repentance and supplication, when the whole existence of Israel was called in question.

"Mordecai rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth with ashes."

What Mordecai did was a sign of personal as well as of public mourning. When Jacob heard of the supposed death of Joseph, we read that "he rent his garments and put on sackcloth" (Gen. xxxvii. 34). David did the same when mourning for his sons. But the symbolism out of which these signs were formed contains thoughts which go beyond the mere idea of mourning. Achilles mourned in like manner as the pious of Israel, and there is nothing to prevent us from assuming that in his display of these external signs of anguish he recognised the idea of repentance (Iliad, xviii. 23).¹

They only show that the whole ancient Western Asiatic world anticipated the word of the apostle, "The wages of sin is death." These external signs of mourning are also therefore public, and so to speak, political and patriotic, because mourning and repentance flow from the same source. The custom of throwing earth and ashes upon the head of a corpse at burial by the bereaved arose also from the idea, that the mourners had brought vividly to their remembrance their state of mortality. For dust has the similarity to decomposed matter. Dust and ashes represent the disfigurement of the face and of the form of the one buried. Homer says: "Achilles deformed the lovely countenance (ἥστατην)," and that in contrast to the washings and the anointings which were used for the beautifying of the body. But ointment upon the head, with its fragrance, was the symbol of life, an emblem of the fragrant flower; just as the flowing hair upon the head of a Nazarite was the type of a portable altar which the holy man should be,—and dust or ashes upon the head was the symbol of the person disfigured by death, and of man who is destined to die, reminding the mourner that he is but dust. The rending of the garments and the putting on of sackcloth were inseparably connected. Together they expressed the opposite of life and enjoyment. It was considered as a renouncement of the world when the comely garments were torn asunder, and when the coarse sackcloth was put on. It was a giving up of the joys of life on account of death. When one mourned with these external signs upon him, he indicated thereby that he was mindful of the transitoriness of all earthly things, and of the insipid vanities of the world. Plutarch narrates of one whom he calls superstitious as follows: “He sits outside wrapped up in a sack or shabby garments, he rolls himself naked in the dust, and enumerates his sins and delinquencies one by one, that he has eaten or drunk this or that, that he has gone in a way which his tutelary spirit forbade him” (Plutarch On Superstition). The same did pious Job, who rent his garments, sat in ashes, his head covered with dust, while his friends sat in like manner near him. The only difference was, that the pious and patient sufferer knew what he wanted when displaying these symptoms of his sorrow. But to Plutarch and to heathenism these things became unintelligible. However, although gloomy customs like these, as well as those which were most beautiful, became in time instruments of ungodliness and superstition, yet we cannot fail to recognise that they originally possessed the inherent thought of repentance, and for this reason became the pictures of mourning and death. Albeit among the Syrians and Orientals in general, they did not call forth true repentance and confession of sin before God. Ahab did the same as Mordecai, when the ascetic prophet Elijah declared to him the judgment of God. "He rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly" (1 Kings xxi. 27). The King of Israel did so in consequence of the preaching of Elisha (2 Kings vi. 30). When the pious King Hezekiah heard the blasphemy of Rabshakeh, "he rent his clothes, and covered himself with sackcloth, and went into the house of the Lord" (2 Kings xix. 1). But the prophet Joel exclaimed: "Rend your heart and not your garments" (ii. 13). For hypocrites and worldly people used to put on sackcloth in order to appear as prophets.

Mordecai's mourning was not merely a conformity to a custom, but it was sincere, heartfelt, and true. And this mourning was repentance. The Midrash shows deep insight into his state of mind when it represents him as a penitent, first of all for his own personal sins, not casting the guilt upon others, and then repenting for the sins of his people.

"And went out into the midst of the city, and cried with a loud and a bitter cry."

These words of the narrator are not without significance and difficulty. The whole manner of mourning at that time could in itself be only intelligible by publicity. It was to a certain extent an ecclesiastical custom, bearing the external and visible signs of instruction and exhortation to the spectators. At public calamities mourning was necessarily a public affair. "In the streets," exclaims Isaiah, "they gird themselves with sackcloth; on their house-tops, in their broad places, every one howleth, weeping abundantly" (xv. 3). But Mordecai does not sit down in ashes and sorrow, but "he goes into the midst of the city." Yet surely this is not a Jewish city, it is Shushan, the residence of the Persian king. Its inhabitants are the very persons who have the task entrusted to them of murdering him and all his kindred on the 13th of Adar. Why does Mordecai go to them with the cry of penitence and mourning? The LXX. has sought to explain this by adding a clause, “A people is about to be destroyed which has done no evil.” But the added clause is an explanation of the Midrash of that time, and has no exegetical force. In the first place, the penitent garment is unsuitable for making remonstrating reproaches. He was penitent, as the Midrash elsewhere says, because he recognised that his nation had sinned before God, and therefore he could not have said that they had done no evil. In the second place, the lamentable cry to excite the sympathy of the people would have been in vain, for they could not grant it. The king’s order precludes all private sympathy, and also self-defence, according to Persian usage. Plutarch narrates, that Teribaz the Persian once successfully defended himself against people who wanted to seize him and carry him off as a prisoner; but when they told him that they came by the command of the king, he at once threw down his sword, and extended his hands to be bound.

The Jewish commentators say that he went into the city in order to make known to the Jews what had happened with regard to them. But they must have known this, as it was everywhere proclaimed. Perhaps he knew it before they did, and indeed he knew more than the proclamation contained. If this be the case, we might expect that the same would be said as occurs in ver. 16, that he gathered together all the Jews that were present in Shushan.

When “he went into the city,” it must have been in reference to his mourning and penitent cry. Therefore the opinion of Clericus is very singular, that “Mordecai cried so loud and so bitterly, because he was convinced of the wrong that he had done to Haman in refusing to adore him.” In that case Daniel must also have done wrong in resisting the impious commands of the tyrant. It is not the lamentation itself which is striking, but the lamentation, on the way to the city of Shushan, before all the Persians, and as far as the court of the king.

It is interesting to notice the contrast between Mordecai and the prophet Jonah, of whom it is written, that he went into the city, viz. Nineveh. At that time Jonah was not penitent, but he preached repentance ; he did not preach to Jews, but to the heathen of the whole city ; and the lowest citizen as well as the king listened to him. Mordecai, on the other hand, was himself a penitent ; his appearance was a forcible wail ; his voice sounded of judgment to come : but only upon the Jews. The king and the people were struck dumb in perceiving that they were to be the executioners of this judgment. But Mordecai was as good a witness as Jonah. The latter was the witness of God before the heathen ; the former, his own witness, in that he declared himself to belong to the people of God in the presence of the heathen. Mordecai belonged to the most prominent men of Israel, for he was descended from the captives who were carried away with King Jechoniah (ii. 6). To these belonged the best class of Israel, as the poor were left behind at home (2 Kings xxiv. 14, 15). Mordecai "sat before the gate of the king." This certainly implied a degree of respectability. Herodotus (iii. 120) informs us that those who sat before the gate of the king were eminent Persians. This is confirmed by what we read in chaps. ii. and iii. He had facilities of detecting the conspiracy, and could maintain himself against the demands of Haman ; for it was not entirely unknown that he had saved the king's life (see chap. vi. 2, 3). But among the Jews especially, it was no secret that the foster-child of Mordecai was the queen. How else could she have issued such an order to them as in chap. iv. 15 ? They must have known her when yet in the house of her uncle. How easily, at least in the opinion of the Jews, Mordecai could now save himself ! The people are generally inclined to overrate influence at high quarters. If he placed himself under the protection of the queen, who would dare to touch him ? Haman himself would not enforce the law against him, if he knew, what he does not know, that this Mordecai possessed such personal protection. With these thoughts in the minds of the Jews, Haman, as the author of their national misery, would have appeared before them as the only one who could save the life of Mordecai. But Mordecai removed their fears or comforts in this respect by appearing publicly in his mourning dress. He did not remain sitting at the gate of the king but was not ashamed to go forward with ragged garments before all the Persians, and to acknowledge himself as one of that people who were under sentence of death. He went into the city with the cry of repentance and of sorrow, in order to show himself before all others as a fellow-sufferer with his people. In taking part in their national sorrow, he does not want to assume any other position, but he wishes to show that he is ready, if needs be, to share with them the common fate that Providence may have in store for them. This he makes known by his wailing all over the city, that Jews and Persians may be convinced of his earnestness. All heard it; he did not desire to escape the notice of the Persians, and the Jews he wanted to arouse by his example to similar acts of repentance, and to strengthen them in their faith. No other Jew needed to go in this manner into the midst of the city, for no other knew so much of the depth of the misery they were in as he did. He desired that the report should go forth that it is Mordecai himself who goes about in sackcloth and ashes. Not ashamed to be known as belonging to the persecuted people, he went back to the king's gate, but not, of course, to his old place, to which he could not come.

Ver. 2. “For none might enter within the king’s gate clothed with sackcloth.”

The historical originality of our book could with certainty be established by this casual remark, for it proceeds from the radical idea underlying the Persian religious system. The doctrine of the Old Persians was perfectly dualistic. To the principles of good and evil—the powers of Ahuramazda and Ahriman—corresponded the categories of clean and unclean in the affairs of daily life. That which had any reference to life was considered clean, and that which had reference to suffering and death was considered unclean. Therefore a corpse, with all that appertained to its burial, mourning, and the mourning garments, was unclean. The sacks, or, as we should say, the gloves, which the bearers wore on their hands, were to be buried (see Spiegel, Avesta, ii. Introd. xviii.). In the third Fargard of the Vendidad, vers. 36, 37, we read : " What is the most unpleasant thing on earth ? " Ahuramazda answered : " When, O holy Zarathustra, the wife or the son of a holy man goes on the perverted way, covered with dust and dirt, and makes a mourning speech " (Spiegel, Avesta, i. p. 80). According to Anquetil, ed. Kleucker, ii. 311, the passage reads : " When a righteous man, a woman, or young person covers the head with dust and goes and comes with weeping and mourning." Now this was naturally only the case among the Parsees, whilst Mordecai conformed to the custom of mourning as practised among his people. But the King of Persia was the visible representative of Ahuramazda ; and therefore what was unclean could not approach his person, his room, or his palace. His house was as the temple of God. No one who, whether in thought or in deed, had participated in the arrangements of a funeral, or was otherwise connected with dead creatures, could enter his apartments. His palace was to a certain degree the seat of the holy fire. Of this it is written in the book Sadder (ed. Hyde, p. 476, n. 80), that " whosoever brings a corpse or anything in connection with it, is said to produce misfortune for himself and others." The castle of the Persian king had an outer and inner court. At the gates of the latter the courtiers, as well as Mordecai, were in the habit of sitting. But when he was clad in sackcloth and ashes, he could only approach the outer court and wail.

Ver. 3. "Whithersoever the king's commandment . . . came, there was great mourning among the Jews, and fasting, and weeping, and wailing."

We read in Deut. iv. 30 : " If thou shalt return to the Lord thy God, for He is a merciful God, He will not fail thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers, which He sware unto them." Of this promise Israel always thought in distress, and also now. Wherever the deadly edict came, there they remembered that God alone was their last resort for help and deliverance. In times of terror and persecution, Israel, when repenting and turning to God, experienced the preciousness of His word. Where else was there at that time a people upon earth who possessed a similar source of comfort in such an hour of distress ? What would the descendants of the Milesian Branchides have done if they had received a similar communication that they were to be totally destroyed ? (Curt. vii. 5. 51). They would have appealed trembling for pity, with ropes upon their necks and naked ; for so used the inhabitants of besieged cities in the Middle Ages to supplicate the besiegers. But the Jews have no thought of this, they do not put their trust in human artifices, they turn to the Lord their God, who commanded them to apply to Him, but with a penitent heart, in the time of their need ; their whole history is but a chain of mercy from their Lord in heaven. They do not appeal to the king at Shushan, but to the Judge of all flesh. They come with penitence, prayer, and lamentation. They appoint days of humiliation for all the congregations. The manner of their mourning is the old-fashioned one. The traditional customs were observed, which only require a new heart and a lively faith to become new also. They consist of fasting, weeping, and wailing (zom, bechi, misped). The prophet Joel when preaching to Israel on repentance and conversion said in the name of God : " Turn ye unto me with all your heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning " (zom, bechi, misped), ii. 12. In the war in which all the tribes were engaged against the tribe of Benjamin, they could not obtain the victory until they repented with fasting and weeping (see Judg. xx. 26, and my Comm.) At the commencement of the time of the Judges, when Israel received a message from an angel or messenger of God who reminded them of their history, they wept, and the place was called Bochim—"weepers" (Judg. ii. 5). To mourning belonged—apart from fasting and weeping, when it was especially on account of the dead, and on account of national sin—the dirge or lamentation, the סִפְרָה, from סִפַּר, "to lament." Most of the expressions for the signs of mourning are borrowed from observations of the conditions of nature. Thus אָבֶל, "to mourn," is borrowed from the fading and drooping condition of a plant, and generally expresses the mourning condition of man. One can notice it in his bearing; if he is humbled and crushed down, then he is an אָבֵל, "a mourner." Therefore Isaiah speaks of "those that mourn in Zion" (lxii. 3). They are such as deplore the lamentable condition of the kingdom of God, not merely by putting on black garments, but by being contrite in heart (comp. my Irene, p. 17). As בְּכָה, bacha, "to weep," surely arises from the observation of the drops of tears flowing from the eyes, so that it was taken as akin to the Greek πηγή, "spring," and the German Bach, "brook," so also ought the grammarians to have long ago accentuated the kinship between the Hebrew סִפְרָה and the Greek σφαδάξω. For among Oriental and other nations, excited movements of the body, and striking upon the breast, are generally tokens of mourning. As an animal kicks about when it is pricked and wounded, so does the uncultured man when he feels inward pain.¹ So is the Greek πένθος, "wailing," to be explained by πάθος, passion; and so also κόπτεσθαι has the double signification of "striking" and "mourning;" so is plangere originally synonymous with tundere.

But the Scripture uses the word סִפְרָה only in its secondary meaning. It is the solemn mourning for the dead which used to accompany weeping. Of Abraham we read that "he came to mourn for Sarah and to weep for her" (Gen. xxiii. 2). The prophet Ezekiel announces to Israel that they will be in such an extreme state of terror and of stupefaction that they will neither be able to mourn nor to weep (xxiv. 16). In the word סְפִיד was not expressed the unarticulated sobbing and sighing, but the spoken lamentation. In Jer. iv. 8 we read : “For this gird you with sackcloth, lament and howl” (הַלֵּלוּ). The substance of such lamentation we hear in 1 Kings xiii. 30, where it resounds at the grave of the old prophets : “Alas, my brother !” or as we read in Jer. xxii. 18 : “They shall not lament for him, Ah my brother ! or, Ah sister ! they shall not lament for him, Ah Lord ! or, Ah His glory !”

In later times the Jews called those who held such funeral orations or sermons by the name of Saphdanim (סָפְדָנִים), who it has been thought are the persons to whom Job alludes in chap. iii. 8, when he says : “Let them curse it that curse the day.” Excessive lamentation for the dead was inseparably connected with excessive praise of them. Therefore in Berechoth 62a, it is strictly inculcated that the funeral orators will have to give an account for making a great ostentation. Among the public rites in connection with mourning, the misped, or “dirge,” or “oration,” was after all the most insignificant part. Hence the index of the fast days which we have under the name of Megillath Taanith, from the time of the destruction of the temple, constantly reminds us that lamentations must not be made. That is, that the fast days should be observed with sackcloth, ashes, and weeping, but without that additional and non-essential misped.¹

“In sackcloth and ashes also the most prominent wrapped themselves up.”

The Hebrew שְׁקָן אֲפָר יִצְעַ לְרַבִּים cannot otherwise be understood. It is not merely multi, “many,” by which לְרַבִּים has been translated since the time of Jerome, as in the second Targum.

Only the first Targumist perceived that in this supplementary word there is something more expressed. When, namely, it is said before, that wherever the sad news came, there was great mourning among the Jews, it would have been superfluous to add that many sat in sackcloth and ashes. No, the word “rabim” must have the same sense as in Job xxxv. 9, “prominent,” “rich,” “mighty.” As in Isa. liii. 12 it is predicted of the Messiah, that He will have the rabim, the “great people,” for His portion or booty, and not merely the poor and the needy, so the same word marks the contrast here. The great and rich men of Israel also did not disdain to put on sackcloth and ashes, which with them was really a sign of sincere repentance. A similar contrast is found in Isa. xv. 4, where judgment against Moab is announced. The armed men of Moab (who are not usually tender-hearted) cry aloud : “His soul trembleth within him” (see Delitzsch, Comm. p. 205). This explanation agrees with what was said before of Mordecai. No one shirked the duty and the need of repentance.

There were many in Israel who in spite of their exile had amassed riches and lived in pleasure, and were eminent, like Mordecai ; but none of them despised the external signs of repentance and conversion towards God. The “rabim” forsook their luxurious ottomans and couches, and laid themselves down (υστρεφομαι) upon beds of sackcloth and ashes, as Job did. This expression, as well as the custom itself, passed into the asceticism of the Church. So we read, e.g., of the clergy in the Consuetudines of the monks of Clugny: “Cineres, qui incapite jejunii fratrum, olim pœnitentium hodie fidelium omnium capitibus imponuntur . . . benedicti conservantur ab Infirmario, ut Mori-entibus fratribus cum cilicio substernantur” (comp. Du Cange).

It is just the complete penitence to which the Jews gave themselves up, just their reliance upon the mercy of God, and the committing of themselves into the hands of their heavenly Judge, which explains the insertion of ver. 3 to connect the preceding and the following verse. Ver. 4 begins the history of the deliverance from the distress. Their first human support was, that Esther had received the news of what had been decided by Haman with regard to the nation. This was occasioned by Mordecai's appearing before the court of the king in sackcloth and ashes, so that he attracted the notice of the people of the palace. One would have expected the narrator to report without interruption: "And Mordecai came before the king's gate in sackcloth and ashes; and then the maidens came and told it to Esther." But as this is not done, it shows the profound thought which pervades the report, in spite of its brevity. For if the insertion had not been made, it would have appeared as if the deliverance of the Jews was entirely ascribed to the fact that Esther was the queen, and to nothing else. But in Israel is manifested that when a people is to be saved, it can only be through repentance before God. When this has taken place, then natural and human assistance comes as a matter of course. For this reason Israel's universal humiliation and repentance is first narrated, and then the history begins with the human deliverance, in which Esther was the chief instrumentality.

Ver. 4. "And Esther's maidens and her chamberlains came and told it her."

They have not told her of the edict against the Jews; of this she only heard afterwards, vers. 5 and 6. In the house of the women, which was secluded and perfectly inaccessible, nothing was as yet known of the State edict. As the queen had no share in the affairs of government, nor could even have an interview with the king without an especial summons (ver. 11), what did the activity of the grand vizier concern the harem? Perhaps the report of his doings would have penetrated the secluded house ere this, if the origin of Esther had been known at court. But why is it said "her maidens and her chamberlains told her"?

The context leads us to guess the reason for the twofold notice. Esther had constant intercourse with Mordecai, otherwise the discovery of the conspiracy (chap. ii. 22) would not have been possible. Besides, Mordecai used to sit before the gate of the king, that he might learn how Esther fared. This intercourse made him an object of notice to the servants of the queen, and it is natural when they missed him in his usual seat at the gate of the court, that they should come and tell it to their mistress as something very strange. But when the maidens said that they did not see Mordecai within the court, because it was unusual for them to leave the house, then the Sarismim, i.e. the eunuch chamberlains, most likely added that he was seen sitting in the open space before the gate in a most lamentable condition, clothed in sackcloth and ashes. The more such a mourning dress was against the spirit of the Persian law, the more astonishment would he occasion in the eyes of the courtiers. Indeed, it was owing to this circumstance that the sentinel did not let him pass within the court.

But when the maidens and the chamberlains brought this report to Esther,—

“Then the queen was exceedingly grieved; and she sent raiment to Mordecai.”

The formation of the word שְׁלֵמָה, from שלם, portrays by its reduplicate sound the terror which this news caused to Esther. But what was it that made her so afraid? As she was unaware of the political ground of her uncle's sorrow, she must have thought of some other, e.g. that a dear relation of his had died, for whom he was in mourning. But this also could not have been the only ground of her dismay; for it would not explain why she sent him raiment. If that were the case, why should she interfere with his conforming to a Jewish custom of long standing? However, her sending him raiment was not a compliance with a Jewish, but with a Persian custom; and this notice also is a remarkable testimony to the original source of our book in Persian life. The modern Persian liturgy has still the following rubric: “When a person dies, the relations, especially the nearest, have to care for his soul. Among the rites that are to be performed belongs an outfit of garments. For new garments must be given which, at least in modern times, become the property of the ministering priest, who puts on the first in the third night after the death of the person, the second on the third day, the third six months afterwards, and finally the fourth on the anniversary of the death" (Spiegel, Avesta, ii. p. xli.). In the Persian Canon Sadder (chap. lxiv., ed. Hyde (ed. 1700), p. 467) we read: "The more magnificent the garments shall be, the more honour thou shalt have. Without garments there will be shame before the heavenly assembly." There is no doubt that we find traces of this custom in the Judaism of a later age. A legend which the book השׁעָדָה contains, reports of a certain Rabbi Ponim to whom the spirit of one departed appeared, saying, that it came from Paradise, and requested him to mend the torn sleeves. For it was ashamed to walk in Paradise in a ragged garment, chap. 213 (comp. Eisenmenger, ii. 212).

Now the above throws light upon the act of Esther. The Jews in Persia, especially those who like herself moved in Persian society, had to a great extent embraced the notions and customs of the Persians. So thinking him to be a mourner for a relative, she sent him the new raiment as a filial duty, and that he might be able to resume his intercourse with her. And this also explains why she was so horrified when she heard of his appearance as a mourner, because she knew that as such he was considered by the Persian law unclean, and therefore must not come near the palace. But in her great love to Mordecai, and sympathy with his sorrow, she involuntarily removes the veil of mystery that was hitherto hanging over her origin before the eyes of her household. She sends him garments, which is just what only relations do to mourners. "How is it," must the messengers or those who saw it have asked, "that the queen sends garments to the mourning Jew?" Nevertheless the mystery was not yet disclosed, for the hour of redemption had not yet come. Her origin still remained an obscure puzzle to her companions, and a holy secret between her and her uncle. But we see in this again a clear proof of the truth, that it is love which becomes the instrument and occasion of succour in every distress. Mordecai refused to accept the garments. He did not wear them for a dead person, but in penitent sorrow for a people who were doomed to die. He did not put them on, but he said nothing. He did not wish to betray the secret to the messengers. If he had desired to say something to her, he could not have refrained from making allusion to her nation. But this he could not do without being sure whether he might trust the messengers. With her, love had broken through the bounds of caution ; while he, in wisely sending back the garments, gave her an intimation that the ground of his being in deep mourning was another and more appalling one than the loss of a friend. He led her, in fact, to conclude that some great danger had befallen, or was threatening, all her kindred, otherwise he would not so promptly send back the sympathetic gift of his beloved niece, which was the only possible means of continuing his intercourse with her.

Ver. 5. “ Then called Esther for Hathach, one of the king’s chamberlains, whom he had appointed to attend upon her.”

Esther, ever since she became queen, had not diminished her love and respect for her uncle. Her heart had not become proud, and she did not look down haughtily from her high position upon her relations. How much her heart beat for Mordecai may be seen from the terror which seized her when she heard that he was in mourning ; still more so from the decision she came to when he had returned the new garments. The sending of these was indeed already fraught with danger with regard to the secret of her pedigree, but it was done on the spur of the moment ; and now she increasingly hazards her secret, deliberately and consciously, out of the anxiety that she has for her friend. The word וְהִנֵּה, “ she charged him,” is emphatic ; the chamberlain is strictly charged to obtain information from Mordecai of what has occurred, and to bring it straight to the queen, no matter what it might be. Her anxiety was too great to allow her to dread lest the chamberlain might possibly through this obtain the clue to her greatest secret.

Ancient Jewish interpreters have understood Hathach to have been Daniel. But the sense they meant to convey by this explanation was, that they thought Hathach was a Jew, and therefore Esther sent him on such a confidential errand. But this conjecture is not only unnecessary, but also contradicts the context of the narrative. True, one might think that she would have preferred to choose a Jew, if he were at hand, for the discharge of this important and delicate business; but this man was the chamberlain whom the king had appointed to attend upon her. Had she had a Jew near her who knew what was going on, she would have been informed of it long ago. He would have been known to Mordecai, who would have transmitted the sad news to her at the very first opportunity. Under the supposition of the messenger being a Jew, the psychological fact of her anxiety to learn the grounds of Mordecai's sorrow, joined with her fear lest her secret should leak out, would remain in inexplicable obscurity. Hathach was a eunuch; as such he was appointed chamberlain of the queen, and therefore a proper person for her to send on a confidential errand. The termination of the name Hathach reminds us of the same termination in Mordecai's name (Mordach) as Artachaeus, Artachaines (see above), it may be supposed that it is in Greek Otaches, like Otanes and Otaspes. The etymological explanation may perhaps illustrate it from the Zend. pazend, jatan, Huzvaresh, ηνν,¹ as nomen dei (comp. Ized). The eunuchs were generally more faithful to their mistresses than other servants.

Phaedyme also, the wife of Cambyses, and then of pseudo-Smerdes, must have had a reliable servant in order to transmit the dangerous message to her father (Herod. iii. 68). It is touching to read of the fidelity of the eunuch Tyriotes which he displayed towards his mistress, the wife of Darius Codomannus, even after her death, and this at the hazard of his life (Curtius, iv. 28).

Ver. 6. "So Hathach went forth."

He went, that is to say, from the palace and its enclosed walls into the open space where Mordecai now sat, and told him of the order of Esther. Consequently, Mordecai understood that Esther had full confidence in her messenger, and so he communicated to him everything. Mordecai's message in return was surely not without danger, for it contained an accusation against the powerful Haman. It revealed Esther's Jewish origin, and it demanded from the queen something which might seriously affect her. He let her know through the messenger all that "had happened" (קרה); he did not conceal from her the fact of his refusal to bow before Haman (for this can only be meant by the word "happened," because it is connected with the sum of money which Haman offered to the king), and that his conduct had provoked the wrath of the vizier. It was necessary that Esther should be informed of everything, in order that in case of need she should be able to expose the trifling and mean motives which induced Haman to persecute the Jews. What Mordecai did at the time was surely with a good conscience. It at all events served to bring the issue clearly before Esther, for the sake of whom he was sitting at the gate, and brought upon himself great danger. The queen must have been touched by observing that Mordecai had remained stedfast in his fidelity to God and in his love to her, and that he did not swerve either from the one or from the other. He did not bow before the idols, but he also did not desert the gate of the king. How mean must Haman appear in the eyes of the king, when Esther would be in a position to tell him that he rewards the piety and faithfulness of such a man by alluring the king to issue such a terrible edict of persecution against a whole innocent nation, and that, forsooth, because his vanity had been offended! Mordecai was well informed ; the transaction of Haman with the king was not unknown ; yes, even the exact sum which the subtle and clever vizier offered was known. We read that Mordecai stated to Esther “the exact sum of the money (פרק הכסף)¹ that Haman had said (רמאנ) he would pay to the king’s treasures ;” in reality he did not pay it, as the king made him a present of it. But he is not satisfied with a mere verbal communication ; he sends her the document of the royal proclamation, in order that she should see that the information is not founded upon mere hearsay reports, but upon written evidence, and be convinced of the fearful condition of the Jews in the country. But he does not stop with his simple narrative. He joins to it a request. When Esther through her chamberlain astonished him with the present of the garments, and had made anxious inquiries as to the causes of his mourning, he at once saw that she was inclined gradually to make known her origin. At any rate, he believed that he had the right to set her free from the pledge of secrecy which he himself had imposed upon her (ii. 20). Her inquiry had not arisen from mere curiosity, and he gives his report also not for its own sake. He tells Hathach “to disclose it” unto her, and “to charge her” (להניד ולצווות) he should tell her that it is her uncle’s and her benefactor’s request, and command, that she should make use of her royal prerogative, and seek an interview with the king to obtain help from him. She had “charged him” to let her know what had happened, and so he now “charges” her to obtain succour. She did so as his queen, and he does so as her uncle. “She should go in unto the king and make supplication unto him, and make request before him for her people." Such weeping and supplication for grace before the king was not an unusual thing ; the wife of Intaphernes, Herodotus narrates (iii. 119), went with weeping and wailing before the gate of the king (like Mordecai), until Darius was moved with compassion and granted her at least some favour. From the beloved queen Mordecai could especially demand that she should do this for the sake of her people. It would not have been extraordinary that a queen should intercede in behalf of the sad lot which had befallen a strange people ; how much more reason was there that she should do this for her own, especially as Ahhashverosh did not even know that she belonged to the condemned nation, and perhaps did not even remember the name of the people whom he had so rashly appointed to die.

Ver. 11. "All the king's servants and the people of the king's provinces do know."

Esther is frightened at the request of Mordecai, but she does not decline to comply with it. It corresponds with her feeling in the matter, though her feminine weakness makes her hesitate and shudder at taking the step, that she declares that she would gladly do it if she could. She would obey his order to go to the king, but he ought to know that this is no easy thing to do. It does not depend upon her to speak to the king when she wants. His own wives can see him only when they are specially called, and her influence over him is not yet paramount, as thirty days had elapsed during which he did not even think of her. And should she even dare to go to him uncalled, and should he be so benign as to receive her when he is sitting upon the throne, she could yet not address him unless he held out the golden sceptre to her, and beckoned her to approach nearer. She does not actually decline her uncle's request ; she does not say that when the king summons her she would not petition him for mercy to the Jews ; but she evades and postpones it, and makes it dependent upon the whim of the king. In fact, the court regulations were so as Esther said. It is well known, as Herodotus narrates, that at the fall of the false Smerdis the only persons who could obtain admission to Darius without being called were his six companions. But this oft-quoted passage is not enough to explain fully the words of Esther. The majesty of the great Persian king was not only inaccessible without his permission, but also no one dared to speak to him without his beckoning on them to approach. For he was the human representative of Ahuramazda. That Alexander the Great imitated the manners of the Persian king we have proofs in many descriptions. Phylarchus in Athenaeus (p. 539, comp. Fragm. ed. Lucht, p. 100, ed. Brückner, p. 36) says, that while Alexander sat on the throne, "no one of his great friends and servants dared to approach him." Ephippus in his description says: "As he sat with majestic look, there was a solemn silence before him." This was the Oriental idea of solemnity and awe with which the august majesty of a king is surrounded.

When an English Embassy was received by Shah Abbas of Persia, we read: "They entered into the audience chamber, where the first officials sat round the walls like statues, not moving a muscle, and dead silence prevailed." No one, even at the present time, approaches the King of Persia without the repeated order from the king to do so. Fraser reports that a courtier, who had made his fortune, when he was asked to come near, answered, "I do not pray to be commanded to approach (mi souzum), I burn to do so."¹ Herodotus tells of a similar sending of messengers to and from the harem. The daughter of Otanes became first the wife of Cambyses and then of pseudo-Smerdis. Her father sent a messenger to ask her whether her husband was the real Smerdis; she replied through a confidant, that she would make the investigation at the risk of her life, but she must wait until her turn came when she would be called by the king (iii. 60).

Here also there was an understanding between Esther and

Mordecai with regard to the king, but a friendly one. She was requested by her foster-father to dare to approach the king without his special permission, but it was in order that she should ask for mercy in behalf of an innocent people.

“That whosoever, whether man or woman . . . who is not called, there is one law for him, that he be put to death.”

The sense of the peculiar form אחד דתו להטיה is that the law makes no exception. אחד (דת, fem.) expresses that the law is absolute and of universal application. Esther wishes to say, that she is subject to the same law, and if she transgresses it, no exception or excuse will be made, although she is queen. For in “the coming to him” (אשר־יבוא) is included the address to him, because she would not come without having to ask him for something. We can see from Dan. ii. 9 that this indicates a standing rule. The King Nebuchadnezzar demands from his courtiers, to give him without fail the interpretation of his dream. “If you are not able,” says he, “then there is but one law for you,” חדה היא דתכון, i.e. “there is but one sentence for you in all circumstances, whatever excuse you may make.”

The expression שרביט occurs only in the book of Esther; it is the form of the Masora for שְׁבֵט, and its relation to שְׁבֵט is as the Gr. σκῆπτρον to σκήπτω (σκηπτοῦχος). The linguistic comparison teaches thereby that the Hebrew letter שׁ has indeed the sound of sh (as in לֹא, σκυλάω, etc.); and the various pronunciations of shebet and σκήπτω rests upon similar dialectical differences, as sch does in German dialects, which in Low German has completely the sound of sk.

The sceptre is said to be golden, just as Homer calls it (ii. 1. 15; Odyss. xi. 91), where the priests and seers carry it in the name of their gods. The sceptre of Achilles was embossed with gold (ii. 1. 246), as Voss translates, or had golden nails. Gold was generally the appendage of royal dignity. Everything belonging to Oriental kings and to antiquity was ornamented with gold, and was called golden, as a crown, a throne, a chair, and pillars. In the Middle Ages they used to speak of "golden Rome" (aurea Roma).¹ Wallace tells of the Burmese, that when they spoke of anything belonging to the king, they qualified it by the word gold, and therefore they spoke of his golden ears and golden feet (Denkwürd. Indien, p. 33; comp. my Kaiser und Königskronen, p. 127).

The sceptre is the royal staff of authority. Odysseus takes the royal staff of Agamemnon in order to command silence and order (Il. ii. 185). To whom permission was given to speak in the assembly, to him the herald handed the sceptre (Il. xxiii. 568; Odyss. ii. 37). The inclining of the sceptre forward towards the visitor was the sign of permission given him to come near. Kings and gods (priests, and in caricature wizards) work and beckon with the staff. The form וָשַׁׁ for "stretching out," "extending the arm" with the staff, only occurs in Esther. It may be dialectically compared with the Lat. tendo and the Greek τείνω.

Ver. 12. "And they told to Mordecai Esther's words."

This additional clause is surprising, for it is already said in ver. 10, "Then Esther spake unto Hathach, and gave him a message unto Mordecai." But it must be so understood that Mordecai made inquiries from others with regard to the custom at the Persian court, and they confirmed Esther's words, that it was really only at the risk of life that one could appear before the king unsummoned.

Ver. 13. "Then Mordecai bade them return answer unto Esther."

Ancient commentators felt it strange that from ver. 13 the name of the messenger Hathach does no more occur, while it is repeatedly mentioned in vers. 5, 6, 9, and 10. The Midrash has from this circumstance developed a legend, viz. that Haman had killed Hathach because he acted as a messenger of Mordecai. It need hardly be remarked that such violent procedure is in perfect harmony with the spirit that prevailed in Oriental courts; yet we cannot accept the legend, as it is at variance with the true exposition of the passage. We may rather explain that the further omission of the name of the messenger by the narrator, was owing to the fact that he had more important subjects to relate, compared with which what became of Hathach was of no consequence.

The answer of Mordecai will appear the grander the more earnestly we consider it. He does not say to her, first of all, “If thou canst not save the people, at least save me, and the house of thy father, for thou belongest to the unassailable house of the king.” This would have been natural enough under the circumstances. But we see that with him there is not a moment’s consideration of personal interest and safety. He thinks of nothing else but of the salvation of the whole of Israel, and of its providential calling. There can be no question with him about the individual, when the existence of the whole nation is at stake. He does not want to be saved alone, nor to be an exception in the hour of danger. He demands from all his people the duty of holding together, and first of all from Esther herself. For she alone is in a position not only to be saved herself, but also to save others. Therefore it is her bounden duty to be anxious for the salvation of her people, even if she should thereby lose her own life, and become the first victim. Mordecai’s words are closely joined with the report of Esther, that it is impossible to come to the king spontaneously without risking one’s life. But when going to the king in such a manner includes the possibility of obtaining deliverance, why not run all hazards ! What worse thing can be expected ? If she is killed in her attempt to save others, then she will die the death of the martyr, as her people should die ! Of course, Esther is in the house of the king : Haman does not even know that she is a Jewess ; and should he know it, he would not dare to enforce the law against her. But this exceptional position is only so far valuable, if she herself will not make an exception. She can make use of it in order to save her people, but it offers no security to her own safety when all Israel are cut down. It is a thing of daily occurrence that a favourite wife should lose her life—as was the case with Vashti. But that a people like Israel, having such promises and hopes in store for them, should be totally destroyed, would indeed be an unheard-of occurrence. If, therefore, Esther should think of using her advantageous position to save herself and her family by separating herself from Israel, the probability is that she herself will be lost, and that they will be saved. Israel's whole history is composed of wonders of salvation. When they were persecuted by Pharaoh, when they were in the wilderness, when they were surrounded by enemies on every side, they were always delivered in an unexpected manner. It is more sure, Mordecai firmly believes, that Israel will in some way or other be delivered out of this trouble, improbable as it may appear, than that Esther should receive security for her own life if she declines to do her duty. We can clearly see that he wants to impress her with two thoughts : first, that Israel was always delivered in an extraordinary manner ; secondly, that it was an extraordinary providence which exalted her to the royal throne. "Who knoweth," says he, "whether thou art not come to the kingdom for such a time as this ?" i.e. whether the one did not happen to secure the other. The answer of Mordecai is a masterpiece of eloquence. He who had loved and cherished Esther as a daughter, seeks now that she should risk her life for the deliverance of Israel. He wills it, because he believes in the deliverance, because he draws from the history of Israel the hope that they cannot become extinct, and because he sees in the wonderful exaltation of Esther the way to the deliverance. This he puts before her consideration with all the paternal urgency and authority which he has still reserved for himself with regard to her. He begins with destroying every illusion of Esther, that she is in danger by speaking to the king, and would therefore prefer not to risk her life ; and he concludes with comforting her that she shall save her life, just because she will not flee from the danger. It is not the danger which is of decisive moment, but the moral aim for which it is sought. He convinces her that escape and silence would be of no avail to her, but that courage and acknowledgment have hope,—not for her own sake alone, but for the sake of Israel which has such a history ; and yet for her own sake, who was formerly a captive orphan, but is now become queen. His chief design was to plant in her heart faith in an overruling Providence, and then she would have nothing to fear.—He was the right man to do this, because she knew how very much he loved her. He would not advise her to sacrifice her life needlessly. Such confidence is necessary in order to have such a faith, which is superior to human anxieties and precautions. That Esther was capable of having such faith, is evident from her former and later conduct.

Of verbal peculiarities in the passage may be mentioned, תְּדִמֵּי, from the Piel, דָמַה, which has completely the sense of imagining, as from it is derived the word דָמָות, image (imago, imaginari).

Remarkable is the position of לְהַמְלֹט בֵּית־הַמֶּלֶךְ ; Mordecai says : Do not imagine to escape “as¹ house of the king.” Esther might think that even when all the houses of Israel would be sacked, her royal house would naturally be spared.

We must not take the words to mean "in the house of the king," the household which she had formed for herself. They stand in contrast to the expression in ver. 14, "Thy father's house." Mordecai thinks that Esther perhaps imagines that as a royal house it would escape, so he says, "But when Israel shall be delivered, then wilt thou and thy father's house perish." In seeking to save thyself, those who are with thee in the royal house may perhaps be preserved; but if thou shouldest nevertheless perish, then the house of thy father will be totally destroyed. The fall of male and female favourites in Oriental courts, as we shall see in the case of Haman, brought with it the fall of the head and members of their families. Mordecai wants in this manner to raise her moral courage, by showing her the disgrace which she would bring upon herself when, although Israel would be delivered, she would fall together with her family, himself of course included, although she had not attempted anything for their deliverance. It would be a disgraceful death.

Ver. 14. "For if thou altogether holdest thy peace."

הַחֲרֵשׁ תְּהִרֵשׁ. The infinitive represents the continuance of silence, "If thou shouldest altogether be silent, and suppress thy concern in the matter." Esther should speak for her people, whether she is called or not called; she should attempt to fascinate the king by her manner and speech, as she can at other times, and more especially now, when it is a question of life or death to her people. The derivation of the verb "to be silent," from the noun חָרֵשׁ, "dumb," "deaf," has been contested ; yet the idea of Gesenius, who adduces the analogy of dumb, obtuse, of κωφός from κόπτειν, is before all others to be preferred. The verb חָרַשׁ, to cut, to work in art, is doubtless from the Greek χαράττω. As from this is χάραξ, "stake," "pile," so has חָרֵשׁ come to mean a "blockhead" or "stupid fellow," who cannot open his mouth, as stipes and truncus in Latin. The biblical colloquial describes by the word חָרֵשׁ, a dumb man, under the notion that he is like a piece of wood, without life, dull and awkward. That חָרֵשׁ was actually used in the sense of "stake," "pile," is seen from the meaning of חָרֵשׁ, a "wood," "bush;" Chald. חָרֵשׁ; Samarit. אַרְשָׁא. The word has the signification of silence also in the Arabic. When חָרֵשׁ has the meaning in Persian of "rough" (homo impolitus, rufus), it is only a confirmation of the above given derivation. But Vullers is mistaken when (Lex. Pers. i. 675) he wants to join it with חָרֵשׁ, ursus, which is from quite a different etymology.

"Then shall respite and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place."

Mordecai is in full assurance of faith that Israel cannot be so shamefully annihilated. He is quite certain that ways and means will be found for their deliverance. He sees an earnest of this in the wonderful exaltation of Esther. But should she refuse to act, deliverance will come in spite of her. The words רוח ו hatchlah occur only in Esther, and have arisen from the influences of the captivity, i.e. they manifest Aramaic forms. רוח is ἀναπνοή, as the Chaldaic Targum uses. The time will come when Israel, as one that has escaped breathless from persecution, will be able to breathe again freely. hatchlah is an infinitive substantive of נצל, "the deliverance;" comp. the Chaldaic הַצְלָה in Dan. iii. 29.

"And who knoweth whether thou art not come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"

The expression "who knoweth" occurs particularly in Ecclesiastes as an exclamation of despair in not knowing what is to come. But it is quite differently used in this place, where it is an exclamation of certainty in the ways of providence, which man does not know as to detail. Mordecai is not a prophet who can say with certainty that Esther's errand will be successful, but he has faith enough to see in her going to the king—difficult and dangerous as it is—a way of deliverance. He cannot describe the result in detail, but he is sure that it will be an important turning-point in the history of Israel, and that Esther was not raised in vain to occupy such a high position. The exclamation מי יודע, “who knoweth,” is here also an exclamation of faith, as in Joel ii. 14; Jonah iii. 9; Ps. xc. 11. For when the Psalmist says, “Who knoweth the power of Thine anger, and Thy wrath as he should fear it?” he believes in the anger of God, the mystery of which had only overwhelmed himself. But the words of Mordecai to Esther were not intended to implant despair, but faith, in her heart. For it is faith which ascribes Esther’s exaltation solely to a special guidance of providence; and however adventurous and sublime the demand of her uncle may appear to her, the extraordinary circumstance of her becoming queen should only act as an incitement to duty, and she should be ready to give her life for the salvation of Israel.

Ver. 16. “Go and gather together all the Jews that are present in Shushan.”

Esther is ready to act in accordance with Mordecai’s request. She certainly had not said too much of the danger which she would have to encounter, but in spite of it she does not resist his demand any longer. She is ready to do everything for her people. It is no common hazard which the woman and the queen undertakes. Clericus was of opinion that Esther only displayed timidity when she thought of the possibility that the king might kill her for venturing to transgress the rules of etiquette. But he overlooked both the awful importance that was connected with etiquette and the feelings of a woman’s heart. The coming and going of the women to the Persian king depended entirely on his caprice. This caprice was inexorable law. Vashti had lost her life because she did not come, although she was commanded; might not the same happen to Esther, who came although she was not commanded? Be it remembered also what the coming of Esther to the king must imply. It must appear in his eyes as a self-willed request for that for which at other times his lust summoned her. This was then debasing to her feeling. She thought the king would misinterpret her motives and regard her profession of fidelity to her people as the flimsiest pretext.

The wives had to wait till it pleased the king to call them. Therefore she thought that if she came and found him in ill-humour, not only might she lose her life, but also her honour, which is worse. She would be dishonoured among her fellow-women of the harem, who considered it honourable patiently to wait until their turn came.

And did Esther know whether she would, even under the most favourable circumstances, succeed with her petition? What if she did not overcome the influence of Haman, and if the order of massacre were not withdrawn? And if she failed, what then! She would in vain have exposed herself to be misunderstood. She would have lowered her royal dignity. Henceforth, even if her life should be spared, she would be an object of hatred and intrigue. If her desire should not be fulfilled now, she must sooner or later succumb.

It is necessary to judge the deeds of men by the circumstances in which they are placed. Torn asunder from the conditions of life of which they are the outcome, they lose for the most part all significance. In itself the seeking of an interview with the Persian king, who is the husband, is certainly no wonderful thing. But when we review the circumstances under which this was done, then Esther appears to have displayed greater heroic courage than the famous Roman women, who out of patriotism were ready to die; or of the Pythagorean women, who would rather have their tongues bitten off than be silent. Just because Esther put her throne and life at hazard, without having any prospect of a certain result—therefore she sent Mordecai word: “Gather together all the Jews that are in Shushan.” To what place? Into the synagogue. She says, בֵּית הַכְּנֶסֶת, gather them into the house of assembly, the Hebrew form for synagogue. What shall they do there? They should fast for her three days

(בַּשְׁר).¹ Fasting was in the O. T. the symbolic form of prayer, as well as the garment in which the suppliant appeared. It represented the attitude and the disposition under which alone true prayer could take place. The man who is not hungry does not ask for food. Out of a luxurious life does not flow the longing after spiritual things and after God. The body must first be mortified before the soul is full of faith. Fasting has no selfish aim. If it does not by fervent and spontaneous prayer spiritualize the body, it loses its value. The sanctification which it offers to the body must be the vessel of the God-loving soul. If this is not the case, then fasting is absurd. Therefore the prophet blames the fasting of Israel when it is severed from true repentance and love (Isa. lviii.). Jeremiah shows that fasting and prayer are inseparable. "And the Lord said unto me, Pray not for this people for their good (for grace, חִנּוּכָה); when they fast, I will not hear their cry" (xiv. 11, 12).² The character of the fasting required by Esther from Mordecai is also given in Neh. i. 4, etc.: "I sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and I fasted, and prayed before the God of heaven." In the same way is fasting understood in the New Testament. When Jesus tells the disciples the reason why they could not drive out an evil spirit (Matt. xvii. 21), He does so by saying, "This kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting." Thus He describes the devoted, penitent, and holy disposition by which alone the suppliant may accomplish such a thing. So also does the apostle join together fasting and prayer (νηστείᾳ καὶ προσευχῇ) (1 Cor. vii. 5). The ancient Church laid great stress upon fasting, inasmuch as she found herself surrounded by a society that lived in luxury and extravagance. It was considered as a disciplinary measure, and as a means by which an individual might overcome self. There were not wanting in those days men who in the spirit of the prophets spoke against the abuses of fasting. Augustine comments upon the above passage of the apostle thus: "Christians may say, 'Let us fast and pray and give, for to-morrow we die.' But of the two sentences, I prefer that they should say, 'Let us give and pray,' instead of the other, 'Let us fast and not give.'" Far be it from the thought that the apostle considered the highest good, i.e. salvation, to consist in the exercise of the bodily powers of man.¹ Similar words Augustine uses in another place, quoted by Suicer from Severian: "Fasting has two wings, prayer and almsgiving, without which it cannot move." Again in his commentary: "Wilt thou that thy prayer should fly to God, give it two wings—prayer and almsgiving."² In his letter to Casulanus, Augustine writes, "I, at all events, find in the writings of the apostles and evangelists, and in the whole document which is called the N. T., that fasting is prescribed; but on which days to fast and on which not, I do not find. Therefore it is the business of the ministers of the Church to arrange these according to necessity and usefulness."³ What is said with certainty is, that to prayer belongs a spirit of fasting. By the appointing of certain fast-days, the dignity both of fasting and of prayer is lowered. Discipline of the body, moderation in eating and drinking, the crucifying of one's lusts and propensities, is the daily fasting which is necessary, and without which the Lord's Prayer cannot be repeated. It does not matter whether one eats meat or fish on this or on that day, or begins to satisfy his old appetite for eating in this or in that hour. This is [only] work and external appearance, and does not increase the strength of life in and prayer to God. Esther wants three days to be devoted to true repentance, earnest prayer, and intercession on her behalf before God, and says that she will do the same in her palace with her servants. One might have thought it would have been enough if she had done so herself, but in her humility she has no confidence that her prayer alone will bring the desired answer. Besides, it is not her own, but the people's affair; the people fast and pray for themselves when they do so for her. She appoints the duration of the fast to be three days, night¹ and day, in which nothing should be eaten or drunk. Of such long fasts, the life of the synagogue affords no other examples; but it is correct to begin to reckon the commencement of the fast with the evening of the first day, as is the case with the Day of Atonement. It did not, however, conclude, like the Day of Atonement, after twenty-four hours had elapsed, but continued till the end of the third day. It lasted then about forty hours, and ended when Esther went to the king, as it is believed, on the third day. The space of time would then be like that in which "the bridegroom is removed from the disciples" (Matt. ix. 15), viz. from the crucifixion to the resurrection, therefore the ancient Church had a fast of forty hours, strictly speaking, and afterwards forty days. This is undoubtedly the passage of Irenaeus, as Bingham proves (Opp. ix. p. 180), for the remark about counting together hours of the day and hours of the night will only then have a meaning if we place a comma after Ὥ>pas. It appears that recent Roman Catholic writers have also maintained that there was no distinction between the forty hours' and the forty days' fast.² When we remember that the number forty was already in the Old Covenant a number used in reference to repentance, judgment, and expectation, as in the flood, in the sojourn of Israel in the wilderness, and in connection with Elijah, etc., we can see the reason why Esther's fast should last exactly forty hours. Curiously enough, the Midrash places the command of Esther to fast in the time of the Passover (p. 94, etc.).

² Prayers of forty hours' duration have been appointed in the Roman Catholic Church since the sixteenth century. There was a fraternity who devoted forty hours to prayer in memory of the death of Christ. The Pope ratified this rule in 1560. On account of ecclesiastical abuses, especially in France, Clement VIII. appointed such a period of prayer for all churches in 1592.

Esther has by this long fast imposed no slight task upon herself and upon the people; but she sees in this the only hope. She knows the danger of her action. "I will go unto the king," she says, "which is not according to the law" (אֲשֶׁר לֹא־כָּדָה). This דֵת, "law," is like the law of God. It is inviolable; death is the wages of its transgression. If men in general, if Israel in particular, had in like manner feared to transgress the laws of God, their peace would have been more lasting. But, at all events, the punishment of the transgressor by the Persian king was sure and unmerciful; but our God is full of mercy and love in all His judgments.

"So let it be!" she exclaims, "I will do what lies in me. Do you your part, fast and pray. And if I perish, I perish as the victim of obedience and love" (כַּאֲשֶׁר אָבְדָה אֶבְדָּה). The whole force of these thoughts lies in the repetition of the verb. She gives by this expression free vent to her pent-up feelings of misery and woe, and to her determination, whatever may come, to submit to the will of God. We have a similar passage in Gen. xlivi. 14, where Jacob, after having refused for a long time to let Benjamin accompany his brethren to Egypt, at last, being pressed by a higher law of love and duty, quietly consents to his going, and exclaims, כַּאֲשֶׁר שְׁכַלְתִּי שְׁכַלְתִּי, "And if I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved." Neither exclamation contains an expression of indifference or of despair, as Ewald maintains (Hebr. Gram. 8th ed. p. 865). Therefore the translation of Arnheim in Zunz's Bible, "I am anyhow lost," is entirely false.

Ver. 17. "So Mordecai went his way." וַיַּעֲבֹר.

The translations hitherto given have not hit upon the sense. If the word meant merely "abiit," "he went away," or as Arnheim translates, "he went about," it, having a definite and well-known meaning, would not have been chosen to express this idea. We must not depart from its sense of passing over. We have in it, when locally spoken of, a local portraiture. Therefore those Jewish interpreters who understood by it, transgression of a law, still retain its proper meaning. It is maintained in the Talmud that Esther's three days' fast began two days before the Passover, and included the first day; and this is incorrectly thought to be proved by chap. iii. 12. Consequently, it is asserted that Mordecai transgressed the law of the Passover (Rab. in Bab. Megilla 15a; Midrash Esther 94, etc.). No other view is found in the first Targum. For the words נִסְמָם וּבְנֶם, "sad and excited," are not the translation of וַיַּעֲבֹר, as Levy (Chald. Lex. ii. 116) supposes, inasmuch as they are immediately followed by וַיַּעֲבֹר; but they merely mean to say that Mordecai was very sad to be obliged to transgress the joy of the feast (חֲדֽוֹת חֲנִינָה). How can Levy ascribe to the Targumist the derivation of the word "anger" from עָבֵר? Another explanation of the Midrash likewise testifies that the word is to be understood in the sense of passing over or transgressing. According to which, Mordecai was displeased with Esther for profaning the feast; but after being better instructed by her on the subject, וַיַּעֲבֹר, "he transgressed" his words,¹ i.e. in the dialect of the Talmud, he withdrew his words. It is impossible that this word should have been chosen without a purpose, and R. Samuel (Megilla 15a) felt this, and explained that Mordecai passed over the other side of a lake or river. Samuel, who himself lived on the other side of the Euphrates, is for this a good authority. The castle of Shushan was situated near the river Ulai, as we know from

¹ Sefer Meg. Esther, "Er überfüret seine Red." [This verb is used in the sense of transgressing in Hos. vi. 7. In Micah vii. 18 it means "passing by transgressions."—TRANS.]

Dan. viii. 2. The royal castle was the real Shushan, and it is of this that the ancient writers speak when they describe the city as situated near the Eulaeus or Choaspes (Herod. vii. 7; Curtius v. 1 and 2, etc.). Mordecai was in the royal fortified town, and transacted his business with Esther before the chief gate. The Jews resided in another part of the city. When he wanted to go to them to gather them together, he had to cross the water to come to the Jewish quarter. Benjamin of Tudela in the Middle Ages still described Susa as lying on both sides of the river, and connected by a bridge across it. So then we see that the word עבָר has a local and graphic meaning, and we cannot have a better testimony for the topographical knowledge of the narrator than we have in this word. In עבָר is contained the idea of passing by or passing over. But Mordecai did not pass by, but he passed over the river, like Abraham and Nehemiah,—certainly not the Euphrates, but the Ulai, into the capital of the captivity,—not to rejoice before God with thanksgiving, but to pray to Him in deep sorrow and in earnest repentance.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1. "Now it came to pass on the third day."

The emphasis which the narrator puts on this date seems to indicate that he had the thought in his mind, that the third day in Holy Scripture marks important facts in connection with the kingdom of God. A pious Jewish narrator chose on this occasion this formula in remembrance of the third day on which God gave the law to Moses in the midst of thunder and lightning (Ex. xix. 16). This third day was the beginning of a new life for exiled Israel. Out of the darkness of death the sun arose in his brilliancy. What God, through the prophet, said to Hezekiah (2 Kings xx. 5): "I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears; behold, I will heal thee: on the third day thou shalt go up unto the house of the Lord," had also happened here. After two days of weeping came deliverance. The prophet Hosea says: "After two days will He revive us; on the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live before Him" (vi. 2). It was on the third day after the day of suffering that Christ rose from the dead, to raise others too. It appears as if the Midrash was thinking of these parallels, when it ascribes to Esther as having cried out in the moment of her great anxiety and anguish of soul, when she had to appear before the king, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" (Ps. xxii. 1). She repeated the very words which were understood by the Jews as referring to the Messiah, and according to Christian interpretation, which had their complete Messianic realization when they fell from the lips of Jesus on the cross.

"That Esther put on her royal apparel."

וְתָלבֵשׂ מִלְכֹות, "she put on royalty," is a form of expression chosen with great precision, and means more than “she put on royal apparel.” She appeared before the king in the full array and attitude of the queen. She wore the crown which he himself had placed on her head (ii. 17). The whole κόσμος βασιλικός is meant, of which Diodorus relates, that Alexander had placed it again on the head of the Persian queen (Bibl. xvii. 38). The additions in Josephus and in the Greek Apocrypha bear already the Midrash character. The queen came to the king.

“And stood in the inner court.” הַפְנִימִית.

Fürst is of opinion that if פניהם should be connected with פנים, the sense would be opposite, viz. “face to face” with Ahhashverosh. But this is not even the case with ἐνώπια, “the face,” expressing the inner walls of the chamber, and means just the opposite of προνώπια, which signifies the external side. The use of the word face in Hebrew, as well as in Greek, comes from the covering of the face; the veil being considered as the door to the face. When the veil is opened, the inner part of the face becomes visible.

Ver. 2. “So Esther drew near and touched the top of the sceptre.”

When the king saw her standing, she gained favour in his sight; he was not angry with her because she came without being called, as she feared would be the case. She found him in good humour. When Bathsheba came to King Solomon, her son, he rose up to meet her, bowed himself unto her, then sat down on his throne, and seated her on his right hand (1 Kings ii. 19). Of course, Ahhashverosh did not receive Esther with the same politeness. Yet the report of Plutarch (in his treatise about the badly instructed prince) is correct, that the Persian kings did not treat their wives like slaves. And Esther wore the crown upon her head; and she did not prostrate herself at his feet, as others were obliged to do, but he saw her standing (עומדת), and he beckoned to her with the sceptre, as one beckons with the hand, as a sign of salutation and of invitation to come near.¹ The poet Zachariä uses the imagery of night as a queen, “Lo, the solitary night beckons with the leaden sceptre” (Adelung Lex. iv. 1563).

It is worthy of remark, that by touching the sceptre she intimated that she had a petition to the king. The sceptre represented royal power; this she touched, because she needed it very much. Nothing more was certainly expressed by the touch; for with the King of Persia, everything that was to be obtained by petition, be it the smallest trifle or the life of a whole nation, was considered as a grant of grace. Amongst the Jews of old the custom was, that a petitioner who desired the grant of a great favour from any one, fell down before him and took hold of his feet, as the woman did to whom Elijah restored the child alive. This was a sign of humility, in the same manner as touching the knees. Pliny says, “The knees of man contain a certain amount of sacredness in them, according to usage of nations. The petitioners touch them; they stretch out their hands to them; they pray to them, as to altars, perhaps because there is vital power in them” (“fortassis, quia inest in iis vitalitas,” Hist. Nat. xi. 45). But this is not correct. The feet or the knees of man were touched out of humility, because the petitioner did not arrogate to himself worthiness to such a degree as to enable him to touch the higher parts of the benefactor’s body. He therefore prostrates himself upon the earth, and can only touch the foot or the knee.

The custom among the Greeks, for a petitioner to touch the chin, had a different significance. Thetis did so when she laid her petition before Zeus (Ilias, i. 501; comp. viii. 371, ὑπ' ἀνθερεῶνος). This also Dolon would like to do, to obtain mercy from Diomedes, but he does not succeed (x. 454), where Crusius in his Commentary on Homer explains, that it was the knee, and not the chin, which was touched. It is not this passage only to which Pliny refers when he speaks of it as a general custom among the Greeks. There was even a particular word, ὑπογενειάζειν, for it. The underlying thought of the custom was, that by caressing and flattering the chin the petition would be granted. It had nothing to do, as Rosenmüller will have it, with the Oriental notion of the sacredness of the beard, for it was peculiar to many nations. Grimm quotes from Gudrun 386 similar customs. It is remarkable, at any rate, that genu, Sanscr. ganu, knee, is evidently cognate with gena, γένειον, Sanscr. hanu, chin, and yet the two customs had different fundamental thoughts. Touching the knee was an appeal for mercy, but touching the chin was an act of flattering the supposed tender part of man.

To be sure, the humiliation of Esther in presenting her petition in the palace of Shushan was not like that of the Venetian Ambassador, Francis Dandolo, before the Pope in 1312. He appeared before the Pope in the presence of many guests upon all fours, and carried an iron chain upon his neck, and thus lay under the table like a dog until his petition was granted. When he bore after this the name of Cane (dog), he deserved it less than Diogenes, who did not know how to flatter (comp. Leo, Gesch. v. Italien, iii. p. 70); and still less than the pupil of Diogenes, who, when asking a favour of a superior for some one else, touched him on his thigh. That person became enraged, for he expected that the suppliant would touch his knee. "What," exclaimed Crates, "are the thighs not also thine?" (Diog. Laertius, vi. cap. v. n. 7.)

Plutarch (on Cold) mentions that a petition was not refused in Persia when the petitioner carried fire, or went into the water. The same custom is still observed among the Turks, and Hammer adduces many examples from the years 1638 and 1655 (Gesch. des osman. Reiches, v. pp. 239, 630).

Esther does not touch the knee as a defendant, nor the chin as a woman; she touches the sceptre of royal authority, because from this she seeks deliverance. In fact, the Persian tyrant arrogated to himself divine power. With his sceptre he dispensed life or death. When the ancient Christians established petitionary courses (supplicationes), and often called them stations, they based them on the idea that they caused the cross to be carried before them. This is spiritually, but not in the sense of material superstition. The cross is the true sceptre of the great King of Grace. He who touches it in his heart will live.

Ver. 3. “What wilt thou, Queen Esther?” (אסתר המלכה.)

Esther came at the time when the king held a reception. This appears from the circumstance that “the king sat on the throne.” At such a time those who had any business to transact with him presented it. This throws light upon the question of Ahhashverosh, “What wilt thou? What canst thou, O queen, want? What has brought thee into the reception room?” It is the language of gracious favour, in which he expresses his astonishment that the queen should also have something to ask.

“What is thy request? It shall be given thee even to the half of the kingdom.” Nowhere does the sublime munificence of the Persian shahs appear to greater advantage than in their readiness to bestow great favours. The more powerful they considered themselves, the more they fancied they could give everything. “Ask what thou wilt, express thy wishes,” were the haughty phrases with which they as divine beings thought of bestowing a favour. The more so here, where Esther, wearing a crown upon her head, asks a favour. As queen she is, as we say, half or part of him; she is his companion in the government (in name and by favour), therefore he says to her, “Ask what thou wilt, thou shalt have to the half of the kingdom.” This was naturally only a benignant phrase, to show Esther his love for her, and the claim she has upon him.—Yet it happened that on similar occasions whole provinces and cities, i.e. the revenues from them, were really given away.

Ver. 4. “Let the king and Haman come this day¹ unto the banquet.”

The caution which Esther uses in her invitation is for us the finest characteristic of Oriental conditions.

She has two things in view, in order to succeed in her attempt to get the edict revoked. It must first become clear to her that Ahhashverosh is indeed so favourably disposed to her that he will also fulfil his promise according to her mind. For that he will keep his promise was sure, but the realization of it was often worse than the refusal. When Darius, son of Artaxerxes, realized the promise that was given him to have the beautiful Aspasia for his wife, he indeed received her, but she was very soon snatched from him; and this also led to his lasting disgrace and to his final ruin (Plutarch, Artaxerxes, 26). When Pythius the Lydian was encouraged by former favours from Xerxes to beseech the king to leave behind one of his five sons who accompanied the expedition, his wish was fulfilled,—he was left behind, but cut into two parts, which were placed on each side of the road, and then the army passed through them (Herodotus, vii. 39). Secondly, she wanted Haman to be present when she made her petition. She thought she must not give to Ahhashverosh the opportunity of talking the matter over early with Haman, and that the latter must not have time to accomplish his design, or at least to arrange for his escape. In inviting Haman, too, she avoided giving the appearance of her petition being detrimental to his interests. Haman himself must consider the invitation as a special sign of her regard for him. We see that Esther manifested in her undertaking a bold as well as a prudent spirit. But the life of a whole nation was at stake, and it was her love to them which nerved and inspired her resolutions. It was a great distinction to Haman that the queen invited him together with the king to her banquet; but she learned already from the favourable reception she met from the king how much she might depend upon his attachment to her, and also what weight she might place upon his regard for Haman. She experimented to a certain degree as to the relations in which Haman really stood to Ahhashverosh.

Ver. 5. "Cause Haman to make haste, that it may be done as Esther hath said."

This shows that the king at once appreciated Esther's zeal. Without a moment's hesitation he granted her very first desire. He had not the slightest suspicion that his minister harboured any ill-feeling against his consort, and he might even have joyfully congratulated himself that the relations between the government and the harem were those of peace and harmony and mutual respect for each other. There is nothing more instructive for powerful autocrats than to observe the great weakness with which they rule. The haughty potentate who believes that he is able to do everything, gropes as a blind man in the dark about the designs which others out of passion and despair are laying for him. While he fancies that he, like a human god, can dispose of life and death, and of happiness and misery, others play with his humour as with a ball. The haste with which he makes Haman come is but the dawn of a gracious morning. Haman hurries unconsciously to judgment, of which he himself was to be the instrument as he was its guilty cause.

Ver. 6. "And the king said unto Esther at the banquet of wine, What is thy petition?"

From the repetition of this question Esther gathered hope. For when the king gave audience to her, he must have seen that the invitation to the banquet was not her only object in coming to him. He must have understood that she had a petition which she wanted only to present at the banquet, where according to Persian custom it could more easily be granted (Hammer, Gemäldesaal, ii. 162). During the drinking of wine, the king used to consult with his family about the affairs which were brought before him. The Persian kings were often tried and harassed on such occasions by petitioners who took advantage of their benevolent disposition. When Xerxes had promised Artaynte to grant whatever she wished (Herod. ix. 109), she asked a present which his wife Amestris gave him, and whose jealousy must thereby have been provoked. When he again promised to grant a similar petition to Amestris, she demanded that Artaynte should be delivered up to her, that she might avenge herself upon her (Herod. ix. 110, 111). Such things were of daily occurrence, and they took place in every department of Oriental life. Procopius relates (Pers. Gesch. i. 5) that the Persian shah under the Sassanides had once told a man to ask any petition he liked, and so he asked something which was against the law: to visit the prisoners “in the house of oblivion.” Almamun the caliph said once to a girl, “Ask what thou wishest;” and she asked the liberation of his enemy (The Thousand and One Nights, ed. Habicht, xiii. 14).

When, therefore, the king remembered at the banquet that Esther had touched the sceptre, and that apparently he had not satisfied her desire by his coming, he then really showed devotion to her, and a readiness to do her a favour, and that in the presence of Haman.

“What is thy petition (שׁאלה)? and it shall be granted thee: and what is thy request (ובקשתך)? it shall be performed.”

The ideas of שׁאלה and בקשה are not the same. שׁאלה signifies to ask, to demand an objective thing, as rogare. What is asked is granted (נתן) by the gift of an object. When Ahhashverosh first spoke kindly to Esther, he did not imply that she might have a נֶאשׁ, a tangible thing to ask. It looks as if the first term was concealed in it. But now he adds to what he said the first time: מַה בְּקַשְׁתָּךְ, "What is thy wish?" The substantive form בְּקַשְׁתָּךְ occurs only in Esther and in Ezra, while the verb בְּקַשׁ is found in the whole of the O. T. It has been overlooked that its meaning "to wish" is lexicographically established. The German word wünschen, Eng. "wish," is derived from it. Thus the Hebrew שְׁקַשׁ (vaksh) corresponds closely to the Sanscr. vāksh, vanksh, Norse óaska, Anglo-Sax. vyscan, Eng. "wish" (comp. my Eddischen Studien, p. 99). Wishing has more of a subjective character. The king therefore says to his wife, as to a wife, "What is it that thou wishest, what is thy heart's desire? Whatever it be, petition or wish, of a general or of a personal nature, speak out, it shall be granted."

The king considers himself as possessing the power which the legends and fables ascribe to those who, as spirits and wizards, allow their beloved to have wishes. When God appears to Solomon, He says, "Ask (נֶאשׁ) what I shall give thee" (1 Kings iii. 5). When Elijah takes leave of Elisha, he says to him, "Ask what I shall do for thee" (2 Kings ii. 9). Alhashverosh fancies himself like the God of truth and like the powers of fiction, to be able to grant petitions and desires of the heart.

"Even to the half of my kingdom it shall be performed."

He repeats at the banqueting table what he said in the inner chamber. From this and other examples it appears that Herodotus (ix. 110) could not have meant that the king only grants petitions once a year at his dining table. This happened especially when he gave a public dinner on his coronation day. This mistake of Herodotus has conducted to the false explanation which he has when he says: οὐνομα δὲ τῷ δείπνῳ τούτῳ, περσιστὶ μὲν τυκτά, δὲ τὴν Ἐλλήνων γλῶσσαν τέλειον. The last word téleion, a complete feast, is surely not a translation of τυκτά, a connection which could scarcely be if τυκτά be Greek joined with τεύχομαι, τυγχάνειν. Therefore the attempts hitherto made to explain the word have been in vain. It appears to me that τυκτά has the analogous sense of γενέσια, “annual feast,” “throne feast,” “coronation feast,” and it is therefore to be derived from the Persian techt, meaning a throne. This throws light upon the narrative in the Gospel of Mark (vi. 21). Herod in his vain conceit entirely imitates the court fashions of the great Persian kings (as the German princes in the seventeenth century aped the fashions and extravagances of the court of Louis XIV.). He also had a feast to commemorate his accession to the throne (τοῖς γενέσιοις αὐτοῦ). The names of his courtiers (though of Macedonian origin) are in accordance with those of the Persians, μεγιστᾶνες. When his daughter dances, he says to her, “Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee.” And again, “Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom.” Thus he imitated the language of Ahhashverosh, which was familiar to him.

Ver. 7. “Then answered Esther: My petition and my request.”

She still keeps back her petition. She sees indeed that she has found favour in the eyes of the king, and has good reason to believe that he wants to do what she will ask him; and yet she hesitates. “Ah, indeed,” she says, “I have a petition and a wish; but if thou wilt show me a favour, then come once more with Haman to my entertainment, and I will tell it thee then.” What she does now is entirely calculated with respect to the nature of the king. She makes him curious and expectant; she excites in him a still greater desire to be kind and gracious by timidly telling him to observe somewhat of her difficulty and embarrassment which necessitates a postponement of telling her desire right out; she assures herself of his love, when he, the tyrant, who is not in the habit of exercising patience, agrees to come once more to the banquet. She increases by this the proofs of her feigned respect for Haman, so that he dreams of being quite secure. She psychologically prepares everything as best she can, before she ventures upon the great stroke, which in spite of the favour of the king may become dangerous. The two intervening days have a wonderfully tragical character. While Esther trembles all over with excitement and uncertainty, while she stands between life and death, with full consciousness that the fate of a whole nation depends upon the success of her enterprise, she must at the same time appear in the character of a cheerful wife, of an interesting hostess, and of an illustrious queen. Nothing about her must betray that she sees in the cup of wine a reflection of the blood of her people; nothing must indicate that Haman the dreaded favourite was invited not to meet with honour, but with judgment. The simple narrative conceals a conflict of thoughts of a highly dramatical character. The sorrowful, prudent woman must overcome two men who hold the destiny of thousands in their hands; she has no weapons for the warfare except her charms and her insight into human nature. But her trembling heart soon found help. Through the guidance of God, who is not named, things take place which pave the way for such a success far beyond her knowledge and calculation. Just then, when she could not withdraw, when delay was no longer possible,—for “to-morrow I shall make known my request,”—events happen which powerfully influence the mind and disposition of the king. There was only one night¹ between one banquet and the other; but it was long enough to announce to Haman and Mordecai an unexpected catastrophe. Esther is to experience, that when one pursues a great plan, it is not necessary for him to fret, nor to think that the result is entirely dependent upon his own power and wisdom.

Ver. 9. "Then went Haman forth on that day joyful and glad of heart."

"On that day," for on the next day there was an end to his joy. To-day his heart was still elated, that he was the first man in the country, and was in great favour with the king and queen, and in fact he had reached the goal of his ambition. It is true that generally an invited guest received special distinctions, as Themistocles received (Plutarch, Th. 29), and as the Cretan Timagoras (according to Athenaeus, quoted by ancient commentators); but they do not form a strict parallel to the case before us. Here Haman laid stress upon the fact that the queen invited him, that she invited no one else to give the king the pleasure of his company, that therefore she must esteem him beyond measure; and the pleasure was enhanced when he reflected that the attendance at such banquets generally turned out very dangerous to the viziers, but in this only honours awaited him. At any rate, it appears clearly from Haman's glee that he was quite unaware that Esther belonged to the people against whom he had issued such cruel orders; otherwise his merriment would have been moderate. He was the more pleased when he thought that he had not noticed any jealousy on the part of the queen concerning his predominating influence over the king. All obstacles appeared to have been overcome by him. He had no longer any rival. Henceforth all must bow before him.

"Mordecai sat in the king's gate; he stood not up, nor trembled before him."

Now also he did not take any notice of Haman; he did not bow before him, nor did he stand up to compliment him, nor was he convulsed either by fear of or respect for him. And Haman was full of wrath that the Jew, the commoner, should not bow before the Magus and favourite of the king. In his vanity he was ashamed that the other courtiers had seen Mordecai's boldness. He was afraid that they would think that after all Haman cannot be so all-powerful, if a man like Mordecai dares to ignore him. Still excited with his self-glorification, the conduct of the Jew appeared to him intolerable. Certainly he knew that this could not last long, for his destructive decree had already been published everywhere; but the time for its taking effect had not yet come, and should he till then tolerate the contempt of Mordecai? The thought occurs to him to wait no longer, and to order at once that he should be killed; but פְּנַנֵּי,¹ he restrained himself. Ancient commentators² have not understood why Haman did not at once make short work with Mordecai; but they were deficient in insight into the customs and spirit of the East. The arbitrariness of the absolute shah is on the one hand a burden to the great, and on the other it secures freedom to the humble people. The unlimited control of the king over life and death, to decide according to the whim and mood he was in, prevented his subordinates doing the same. For the nearer they were to him, the more they were exposed to the same treatment.

The position which a grand vizier like Haman occupied was an exalted one, but not the less dangerous. He had to take good care not in any way to give the appearance of arrogating to himself the prerogatives and functions that belonged to the shah. He was surrounded by enemies who were jealous of him. There were many others who wanted to supplant him, and the intrigues of the seraglio might become at any moment dangerous. To do away with Mordecai in a quiet manner was in itself an easy thing for him, but he feared the consequences. When we read above (iii. 6), "But he thought scorn to lay hands on Mordecai alone," it means that he did not think it worth his while to risk his position for such a man. It was permitted to everybody to sit at the gate of the king. This law was recognised even under the Turkish sultans. Jews and Gentiles could appear before the gate either to present a petition or to pay homage, just in the same way as all could place themselves before the sun to be warmed.

The idea was that all had the liberty of receiving the beams that shone from royal majesty. Now, this being the case, if Haman had privately killed Mordecai, the intriguers of the palace would have eagerly reported to the king that Haman had murdered one that had placed himself under the protecting wings of the king, and who appealed for protection ; that he encroached upon the rights of the king to pardon a criminal, and that he had done this from personal spite and vanity, without asking for authority, and before the very holy gates of the king. The mistrust of the king would thus have been aroused, the enemies would have gained time to complicate matters further, and the consequences would have been incalculable for him. Haman thought of all this, therefore he restrained himself from adopting harsh measures at present, until he had first consulted with his party.

Ver. 10. "And he sent and fetched his friends, and Zeresh his wife."

Every one of the great men who had obtained power had his party. In this the absolute government did not differ from the modern constitutional forms of government. It is therefore such a party meeting which Haman at this moment calls together. The occasion for it is not his encounter with Mordecai, but the new good fortune which he believes has befallen him. The narrative has for this reason an extraordinary dramatical character, since it presents Haman as seeing in the invitation of Esther the crowning of his ambition, while she was actually preparing measures for his fall. Having become the attached friend of the king and queen, how powerful is his position ! So he gives a kind of account of this to his friends and to his wife, for they share in his honours and power. It is wonderful enough that to-day he describes to them all his glory, while, unknown to him, the to-morrow will strip it from him entirely. He shows them how rich he is—how numerous are his sons—also the number of his faithful adherents upon whom he can rely. He further communicates to them that he enjoys the highest confidence of the king, who has bountifully lavished his honours upon him; and that of which he is still more proud is, that the queen was quite partial to him, and had so distinguished him as to invite him only, together with the king, to her banquet. In fact he pours out his whole joyful heart before them,—for really more pleasures he cannot expect.¹

Ver. 13. “Yet all this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king’s gate.”

He tells of this vexation also. He is, forsooth, ashamed to tell of the real ground of his vexation. He simply but emphatically gives them to understand that his joys are embittered by being obliged to see Mordecai at the royal gate. The more we consider Haman as the representative of a religious party, the more force we see in this complaint brought before them, as it is intended to awaken their general interest in the matter of the Jew being still tolerated at the gate of the king. But what is to be done? Let them give advice, for his honours and his attempts are as much theirs as his. But their interests will certainly not be furthered if the Jew should still be suffered to sit at the gates of the king.

Ver. 14. “Then said Zeresh, his wife, and all his friends unto him.”

It is evidently correct to take this name as related to Zairi, gold. Other Persian names seem to have the same compounds (Zariadris, Zariaspa); it is the same name which Jewesses of a later age frequently have, like Zahab (gold) Chryse, and in Germany, etc., Golde (see Zunz, Namen der Juden, p. 71).

Naturally they are not merely Jewish names, as the name Chryse is mentioned by Homer. The German name Goltrat (in ninth century) has some connection with this (in opposition to Förstemann, Namenbuch, i. 543).

Thus also in the house of Haman Zeresh represents the decisive and regardless person. She speaks first, and proposes the worst means. Her fanaticism excites the whole party. Her diabolical subtlety soon finds its condemnation through the fidelity of a noble and obedient wife. What she advises Haman to do is to use the moment, and to act decisively while he has the opportunity. Now he stands on the pinnacle of favour with the king. A day must not be lost; to-day he must proceed to act, and is sure of success. He must by no means delay, for who knows what changes may come in the interval? “Let a gallows be made”—then go to-morrow to the king. Has not the king presented thee with the whole of this people, because they are contrary to the law of the empire? Why then dost thou not quickly execute this obnoxious man? Go and do away with him, and then when thou goest again to the banquet of the queen, nothing will vex thy soul! This advice was certainly clever and bad enough, and would have been carried out, if a mightier arm from heaven had not frustrated it. A gallows fifty cubits high should be erected. With regard to the mode of execution we shall speak later on. She wants to intimate that this individual is guilty of high treason. So high should the gallows be, that it may be seen far and wide what happened to the man who offended Haman. The height of the gallows for the enemy should proportionally contrast with the high position of the person against whom he had sinned. A Persian cubit was three digits longer than the common Greek (Olympic) cubit, as Herodotus says (i. 178), where, without doubt, he means Persian or Greek δάκτυλοι. Böckh decides for Persian. Accordingly, the Persian cubit had 24 digits, and was in proportion to the Greek as 8 : 7, and contained 234,274,286 Persian lines (Meterol. Untersuch. p. 219).

But this prudence came to nought. However short the time was in which her plan was to be carried out, it was yet too long; judgment came sooner. The apparent exaltation of Haman was really his fall. It is dreadful to think that he intended going to Esther's banquet with a complacent countenance after he had murdered her dear friend. But what is even more striking, that the cruel deed fell upon himself. What he has so long postponed, viz. the punishing of Mordecai, in order not to give a handle to his enemies, becomes now, when he thinks he may safely execute it, the stepping-stone to his fall. The height of fifty cubits becomes at last the picture of the depth of his fall. His adherents and Zeresh have rejoiced with him in his triumphs; and so they fall with him in the abyss of destruction.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1. “On that night the king's sleep fled from him.”

No one has command over sleep. When, therefore, in ancient times sleep was represented by the figure of a lion, it was because the lion subdues all, and does not suffer himself to be subdued. The great king wanted sleep, but sleep would not be caught; like a flying butterfly, it continued coming and going. Why could he not sleep? It need not have been on account of fear or sordid cupidity (sordidus cupidus, Horatius, Od. lib. II. ad Grosphum). Was it because he had taken too much wine—of which it is said that it drives away sleep? This also need not necessarily have been the case. It often happens to kings, and especially to Oriental despots, that the care and responsibility of government, their remorseful consciences and gloomy forebodings, deprive them of sleep. Suetonius (cap. 50) tells of Caligula, that he so suffered from sleeplessness, that, tired of lying in bed awake, he used to get up and stand or roam about the rooms of the palace. Procopius reproaches the Emperor Justinian with being cursed with sleeplessness, so that he is obliged to roam about the whole night (Hist. Arcana, ed. Bonn, pp. 81, 82). Similar restlessness of conscience and sleeplessness is reported of the energetic but cruel Caliph Al-Mansur (comp. Hammer, Gemäldeaal, ii. pp. 70, 89).

Of the Turkish sultan, Selim I., it is told that he was in the habit of passing most nights in reading books, without sleeping at all; sometimes he would have others read to him, or talk to him about the affairs of the State (Diez, Denkwürdigkeiten von Asien, i. 266). In the history of Ahhash-verosh, that sleepless night was illumined by the torch of a people's emancipation from worse than slavery. It caused his mind to meditate upon the past. The night often becomes a means of awakening serious reflections. Quietness and leisure cause the mind to collect its powers, they rouse the conscience, they bring to remembrance what is lost, they set free from the excitement of the daily routine; and happy is he to whom they are as a ladder to God, to whom belongeth the mysteries of salvation and redemption.

“And he commanded to bring him the book of records.”

It is also known from other sources that the Persian kings had every service that was rendered to them entered in historical books.¹ Of Phylakus we read in Herod. viii. 85, that he was recorded as a benefactor of the king, and such were called “όροσάγγατοι.” This word has surely not been correctly explained by Rosen and Bötticher (Arica, p. 20); it has rather a connection with the Persian Ersans, Orosans, שָׁרָאֹנֶשׁ, dignus, “worthy,” and means even now in modern Persian beneficium, “benefit” (Vullers, Pers. Lex. i. 79). Likewise Herodotus reports (viii. 90): “As often as Xerxes saw that one of his men distinguished himself by some act in the naval battle, he made inquiries about him, and the secretaries registered his name, and his captain's, and his family name, together with the name of the town from which he came.” To the same effect Xerxes wrote to Pausanias (Thucydides, i. 129): “The service will remain in my house for a continual remembrance” (which examples were already noticed by Grotius, though not correctly explained). It is not to be assumed that the books in which the names of benefactors were inscribed are different from the general chronicle of the kingdom, for the events of the court were also the events of the kingdom. There was a royal and grand reason for so greatly valuing every service rendered to the king as to put it on record, so that it might be brought from time to time before his remembrance. On the one hand, what concerned the king was considered worth remembering; and, on the other, such a record was an incitement to his subjects to attachment and submission. What is gained now by receiving decorations and titles was gained at that time by having one's name inscribed in the chronicle, and by the title Orosang. But in every case the preservation of historical facts, however little in themselves, proved their beneficial power. Recalling to mind past events is always instructive and useful. The cherishing of remembrance may become the means of leading the individual to a higher life. In our narrative the finding of the forgotten fact in the book of records, becomes an important factor in the deliverance of Israel. Ahhashverosh is warned against bad deeds, and inclined towards good ones; Haman already finds the commencement of his condemnation. How much, indeed, the occurrences of this night humble all human foresight! In that night all those machinations of revenge, spun in the dark, are scattered; and while Esther still trembles, because she thinks that she alone must be the instrument in Israel's deliverance and Haman's fall, the foundation thereof is already laid by a higher hand. The greatest achievements of men are only portions of coinciding interpositions, which the spirit of truth orders and directs in history.

Ver. 3. "And the king said, What honour and dignity hath been done to Mordecai for this?"

The thing was indeed of the utmost importance. The life of the king had been at stake. What greater thing can be for the king than the remembrance of this event! Should not he who had saved his life be royally rewarded! It was against the dignity and the pride of the great tyrant not to acknowledge this on a grand and magnificent scale.

But though the rewards were generally entered in the book of records of the court, it was omitted in Mordecai's case. This circumstance surprised the king the more. It was not only that he felt grateful to his benefactor, but also that it was an offence to his majesty that the record of the empire should have nothing to show of a reward to the man who had saved his life from the conspiracy. “What honour and dignity” (יִקְרָר וּנְדוֹלָה), he asks, has been done to Mordecai for this, for such he deserves who has rendered so great service to the king? The courtiers reply, Nothing has been done to him; and they lay the blame upon others. This reply of “Nothing” excites in the king mistrust and ill-humour. A man who detected and denounced the conspiracy of his eunuchs has received nothing! May it have been that those whose business it was to propose such a reward were dissatisfied with the king’s escape?

Did his courtiers manifest no zeal and joy in the good deed, even so much as to mention the benefactor’s name with approval and praise? Mordecai did not ask anything—and who, with all these meritorious services which he had rendered to the royal house, would have remained content without receiving a reward either openly or clandestinely? He had no friends whom he could expect to recommend his case and to promote his interests. Courtiers protect others only when it is to their own advantage. Mordecai was a free and independent man. He did not send in any petitions, and did not court any one’s favour. How should he receive anything! Merits alone are not enough for obtaining a reward. These examples reveal to us the hollow condition of the whole royal power. The king does not even know whether deserving servants receive any recognition, where those who surround him keep them in the dark. He cannot even show gratitude, which is his chief duty. What a caricature is such a shah who demeans himself like a god! Have no confidence in great men, nor in princes, says the Psalmist. But this is our comfort, that the heavenly King knows all things and knows our heart,—that there is no nepotism in His kingdom,—and that His willingness to give to and atone, does not depend upon a priest. The table of the Lord's Supper, where He thinks of those for whom He died, belongs to Him and to no one else.

Ver. 4. "Who is in the court?"

The indignant king wants to carry out at once what he has omitted before. It is not so much out of regard to the person of Mordecai that he is so urgent, but rather on account of his own pride. He is vexed to think that there should be a man in existence who had saved his life, and who could say that he had done it gratis. Officers were at all times waiting in the court to receive orders. The king does not want to lose time in causing any particular person to come, in order to bestow the delayed reward. The first man who is in the outer hall court should do it. The king does not even think of Haman. Now, although it was something unusual for a man in the high position of Haman to make his court visits at the dawn of the morning, yet this time he was there at that very moment. Never was there exhibited a more frivolous and thoughtless judgment than that shown by many critics in their light estimation of the value of the Book of Esther. For surely there can be no more beautiful description of the impending dramatic catastrophe than that with which the whole of this book is full. At the moment when the mind of the king has but one thought, to compensate Mordecai with the long-merited honour and dignity, and so much the more because it ought to have been done long ago,—at the very moment when he looks for a person to carry it out properly, just then, Haman makes his appearance on the scene. What does he want? To ask for an authorization from the king to hang this same Mordecai on the gallows which he has already erected. Haman was in a hurry. Early in the morning the execution should take place; on that day he should see Mordecai no more in his accustomed seat; for he could no longer bear to behold the obstinate Jew. Before he goes to the banquet of Esther with a triumphant heart (to the banquet of Esther, the adopted daughter of Mordecai, though he knows it not), Mordecai shall be no more. The removal of this faithful man would, in his opinion, enhance the honour of enjoying the good things at Esther's table.

But time is not given him to make his proposal. Before he had yet left his house his doom was already fully developed. Scarcely has he arrived when he is summoned to appear before the indignant king. Mordecai, who knows nothing of what is going on, is the object of a wonderful conflict of ideas and intentions in the royal sleeping apartment. One wants to honour him, and another wants not only to degrade him, but also to hang him on the gallows. Spectators, too, are there who observe these strange coincidences. They are the servants of the king (נָעָרִים הַמְלָךְ), who know of the gallows which Haman had erected for Mordecai, and now hear of the purpose of the king to reward him. They act like genuine courtiers, and do not reveal to the king the intention of Haman out of fear of this man ; nor, from jealousy, do they communicate to Haman, even if they have time to do so, the thoughts of the king. Haman in his vanity, and still dizzy with excitement on account of the special favours which he experienced yesterday, sees in the circumstance that he is called in so quickly, a happy omen for himself. Never has any one fallen so blindly and so self-deceived into the snare of destruction as he did. What is written in Ps. xciv. 21, "They gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous, and condemn innocent blood. But the Lord hath been my tower," was now fulfilled. Of course it afterwards received a greater fulfilment. "When they shall go to and fro" (German trans.), says Hos. vii. 12, "I will spread my net upon them." This was so in the case of Haman.

Ver. 6. "And the king said, Let him come in."

Even the highest minister is not so eminent as not to accept the orders of the king; for in point of fact all his officers are his slaves. Certainly, the king cannot make Haman responsible for Mordecai not being long ago rewarded for his deed, since at that time (iii. 1) Haman had not yet been exalted to power. But the suspicion and the ill-will of the king towards him are seen in the fact that he does not tell him what had passed during the night, that he does not ask him anything about Mordecai, that he does not even mention his name, or give any reason why he wants to reward him. The general abstract question : “ What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour ? ” shows that he has no confidence in Haman. He cannot trust him to say the right word, if the person upon whom the honour was to be conferred does not please him. And the king had a right to suppose that that person could not be beloved by Haman, or else he would have long ago asked for some acknowledgment of his services. A man with such merits, who had received nothing, is surely not a friend of the momentary favourite. There was a tone of ill-humour towards Haman in the general question which he put to him, inasmuch as he was of the highest rank among the court officials ; but Haman does not see it. In his infatuation even the vagueness of the question appeared to him to have but one definite meaning, namely, that it contained a very flattering recognition of himself. He was so sure that he saw everywhere success to his efforts. When the king called out, “ Let him come in,” it was no honour to Haman that he, the first and best man, should act merely as an instrument of conferring high honours upon a man who was his subordinate. But he believed that he had found in the early audience to which he was ordered a new sun of royal favours which was to shine down upon him. When he was so early in the day and so specifically asked as to the manner in which a favourite should be honoured, he thought it could not possibly refer to any other person than himself. This, he explained to himself, must be the reason why he, and no other, was called in, and why the king did not mention any name, lest he should perchance in his modesty fail to do justice to his merits. How vain, indeed, is the wisdom of these children of the world ! They fall into their own traps. In his self-love he ascribes to the king such a tender conscience as purposely to make the question a general one in order not to hurt his delicate feelings, and so he thinks of using his opportunity of asking a good deal. He thinks, too, that he would at the same time flatter the king by placing the honours to be conferred in the highest possible scale ; and with all this he hypocritically pretends to be impartial, as he does not yet know whom Ahhashverosh means.

Ver. 7. “And Haman said unto the king.”

The foolishness of haughty and yet servile men repeats itself. When Xerxes allowed Demaratus, the Spartan, frankly to ask what he wanted, he asked to have the crown of the king placed on his head, and to be led through the city in the same manner as the king was. According to Plutarch (Themist. xxix.), Mithropaustes, the king’s uncle, said to the vain Greek: “The king’s crown could not cover a brainless head ; and should he even hold the thunder in his hands, he would still not be Zeus.” Seneca, who tells the same story (De beneficiis, vi. 31), properly says, that he was deserving of a reward so long as he did not ask for it. The parallels which Clericus adduces are not properly to the point. Haman proposes, for the person to be honoured, the same distinction as Demaratus asked, only in a higher degree. The individual concerned should be arrayed entirely as the alter ego of the king ; he should put on the royal apparel, he should ride upon the king’s own riding horse, and he should wear the king’s crown. Haman, who thinks that all this will fall to his lot, wants thereby to appear throughout the whole of Shushan as the “other I” of the king, in order to subdue all his opponents. As if he were the king himself, one of the foremost princes should lead the horse by the bridle during the procession through the city, and should proclaim before him : “Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour.” All this has its deep foundation in Oriental life.

The Hebrew word כַּהֶּן, “crown,” is none other than the traditional Greek κίταρις or κιδαρις, the tall Persian imperial hat which we sufficiently know from coins (see Spanheim, De praest. et usu numism. i. p. 470). Such town-criers as Haman here asks, we often meet in Oriental histories (Gen. xli. 43), —also when one was led to be disgraced. Just as here the crier is to proclaim the reason for the honour, so also he was called to proclaim the reason for dishonour. In a story of The Thousand and One Nights (ed. König, xi. 19), the Imam of the place is led through the city, seated upon a camel backwards, and a crier goes before him and proclaims: “Thus are those punished who mix themselves up in affairs without being called to do so.” Also the leading by the bridle on such occasions is a well-known custom (see Hammer, Rosenöl, ii. 33).

It is a shrewd remark of the old Jewish commentators, that although Haman had also asked for the person to be distinguished, the ornament of the royal Kidaris (Keter), yet afterwards we read only of the apparel and the horse. They concluded from this, that Ahhashverosh did not permit the crown to be given. It is true that ver. 10 does not mention the crown, yet this does not conclusively prove that it was not used. On the other hand, the words “apparel and horse” imply that the officer to be appointed as attendant had special functions to discharge besides robing, putting on his spurs, and holding the bridle.

How exquisite was Haman in the wishes of his vanity! How smart he thought he would look when he would plume himself in royal magnificence before all his friends! How he would tower in grandeur even over all the highest of the kingdom, the Parthemim! (comp. chap. i. 3). But pride comes before a fall, and the higher he thinks himself to be, the deeper he falls into disgrace. The prophets could not teach a more striking lesson than is taught in the history here.

Ver. 10. “Then the king said to Haman, Make haste.”

These are friendly words, but they fall like thunderbolts

upon his ears. Apparently they are unimportant orders, but they shatter his pride as a stormy wind breaks a reed. The king had evidently anticipated that Haman would think that he was to be so highly distinguished. Therefore he thought if he made him the groom to Mordecai, it would be in itself a lesson to him. Then he noticed that his servant wanted to play the king, and this stirred up jealousy in his breast, as is the case with all tyrants. And yet with all this he thought: Haman considers such a condescension upon my part a mere act of grace. He wants to be reckoned among the great Parthemim of the kingdom; his wishes shall be granted. To them would fall the honour of holding the horse's bridle of the person to be distinguished, and he shall have that honour. But Haman hears of the new dignity with a shudder. For this honour is his shame. When he thought that these great dignities concerned himself, it pleased his pride to be attended by a compeer; but now he is singled out to attend upon the man whom he abhorred from the bottom of his heart, words cannot describe the galling annoyance which this command caused him. What, he? Impossible! But who else? That Mordecai, whom he just now was about to hang on the gallows! That decided enemy of his; that Jew of whom he was going to make an example, and let him feel his power before he breathed his last breath, upon him he should attend all over the city! How could he look after that in Mordecai's face, if he should happen to meet him; and what will the people of the city say when they see Haman invested with the office of stable-boy to such a man as that! It is necessary to realize the vanity, intoxication, and false security which possessed Haman's soul in order to see how low he sunk when he heard these words of the king. While he dreams of the glory of becoming an "alter ego" of the king, he all of a sudden is made to feel the entire pressure of his humiliation. If the whole psychological process which was going on in the vain man's mind is considered, one would find that the judgment of Haman has no parallel in the whole history of the world, nor has there been a humiliation of a statesman or any other great man like his. Many conceited Ministers of State have been sternly rebuked and dismissed. The Persian history offers an example in the case of a vassal of Mahmud of Gaznas, who made another run like a slave by his horse, and soon afterwards had himself to run in like manner by the horse of him whom he had humiliated, and to live in the prison which he had built for him (Malcolm, Gesch. v. Pers. i. 204). But the ground of his fall was an external one. Haman fell from the enormous height of his vanity. He fell at the feet of him whose deadly enemy he was,—and before a man who was innocent,—whom, in spite of his piety and fidelity, he so cruelly persecuted. He was at the same time wounded in his pride and in his conscience. One must indeed be like Haman, a willing Persian courtier, now as abjectly slavish as before he was wicked, in order to endure the humiliation that he had to undergo.

Whilst he apparently showed unconcern in the matter, and acted as if he felt nothing amiss, and left the king as an obedient and zealous servant to discharge his duty with regard to Mordecai, his cowardice was greater than his vexation. One can sufficiently realize the scene which took place when he met Mordecai at the gate of the king. Mordecai must have for a moment imagined himself to be like that Hassan in the fable whom Harun Ar-rashid in his sleep arrayed in the gaudy dress of a caliph, and brought into the magnificent apartments of the palace. "His mouth must have been filled with laughter, as one that dreameth" (Ps. cxxvi. 1). But the uppermost feeling of his heart must have been that of praise rather than of victory. He then learned a fresh meaning in the words of the Psalmist, "The Lord alone doeth great wonders;" "The Lord releaseth the prisoners." For in what other mood could a believer in the living God of love and truth express his astonishment at seeing the author of all enmity against his people coming in the name of the king to be his servant, whilst he and his people are still mourning and fasting? His heart must, of course, have palpitated when he heard that Haman, his implacable enemy, is to lead him riding through the royal town. The proud vizier is to be his herald and slave; but he realized at the same time the full assurance of hope, that if this can happen, God will surely not forsake His people, but will redeem them in a marvellous way.

When Haman afterwards lost his life on the gallows, his death-agonies were nothing in comparison to the humiliation he had undergone when he humbly begged Mordecai to permit him to wait upon him. The agony was great enough when he was obliged to decorate another, and in this case a Jew. But it was quite unendurable when he remembered that everybody knew how he hated Mordecai; that the latter had not paid the slightest respect to him; and, above all, that Mordecai was aware of his wicked plan, and would rejoice at its overthrow. Haman judged every man by his own standard. He could not appreciate a servant of God, as Shimei could not appreciate David in humiliation. He therefore suffered, not only in reflecting upon his own miserable condition, but also in pondering upon the achieved triumph of Mordecai. It would be worthy of the pencil of the greatest artist to picture the two faces as they stand opposite each other. That of Haman, who, in spite of the enormous internal vexation which breaks his heart, looks externally courtly, complacent, and careless,—and that of Mordecai, solemn, emaciated by much fasting, prayers, and tears; and yet with a halo about it, arising not from joy over another man's misfortune, but from a heart attuned to gratitude to God. His eyes are not directed towards Haman, but towards heaven. “I will lift up mine eyes unto the mountains, from whence cometh my help.”

Now the king looks intently upon Haman to see what effect his words would make upon him; he therefore repeats the order twice, "As thou hast said," and, "Let nothing fail of all that thou hast spoken." Horace, while in his first satire narrating the parable of Tantalus, uses the well-known sentence: "Mutato nomine, de te fabula narratur." A tone of irony pervades the words of the king: Do not err, "de te non narratur." There is no thought of thee, but carry everything out as thou hast said.

We find a grand antithesis in the parable of Nathan before David. As if Nathan had asked: What shall be done to the man who has done this? David's anger is kindled against the man, and he says, "The man that has done this shall surely die!" And Nathan says: "Thou art the man." Thou hast pronounced thine own sentence. But here is David, a penitent sinner, seeing in the parable of Nathan a picture of himself, and soon applying it to himself; and the judge is not Ahhashverosh, but the living God.

The explanations given to this passage by the Rabbis are more of a triumphant than of an exegetical character, as might be expected from them, when later similar experiences brought it vividly to their remembrance. The reader in the synagogue, when he comes to this passage, raises his voice as if momentarily triumphant; but these are notions suitable to them, and not in accord with the spirit of the ancient witnesses in the Old Testament. It is certainly an idea borrowed from Oriental life when they represent Mordecai as putting his foot upon the neck of Haman when he mounted the horse. Such things occur (see Hammer, Gemäldesaal, v. 45), but the humiliation of Haman's soul was much greater.

Ver. 11. "And caused him to ride through the street of the city."

Rehob (רְחוֹב), street, is an open space. The Oriental towns had a free space for riding and racing, something like a hippodrome, which is called Atmeidan in Constantinople. Upon the open space where equestrians and equipages appeared, Haman was to lead Mordecai in procession. It may also mean the principal street, the broad way leading through the city. He was to display him before the greatest number and the most prominent of the people.¹

Ver. 12. “And Mordecai came again to the king’s gate.”

The pious man was not changed by the honour shown to him; he did not esteem himself the better for it. In his view things were as before. The people were still in danger. Whether his life is now secure, this did not enter his mind to inquire. He was sufficiently conversant with Persian customs to know that this incident had in no way changed the situation of his people, and that what had been conferred upon him was only a self-glorification of the king himself. So long as the decree which threatened destruction to his people was not revoked, there could be no progress. Yet he was sure that God would wonderfully send help. So he resumed his place in sackcloth and ashes. He, who had just now attracted the envy of all the spectators who saw him wearing the king’s crown upon his head, is now seen sitting at the royal gate, and covered with the mourner’s garment.

But how much happier was he in his mourning than the one who hurried home with bated breath! Haman looks now as an נזן, “a mourner,” who had just returned from the burial of his beloved, for he comes back from the grave of his insolent pride.

How provoking to him was the ride of Mordecai through the city; while the people hailed him who had saved the king’s life, he is laughed at and mocked by everybody, and Mordecai in envied array looks down upon him. He must hold his tongue, and hold the horse by the bridle, and perhaps be kicked by it. At length the ride is over ; he went home hurriedly (נִמְנַח, “ impelled ”), crushed (which is properly the sense of נִמְנָח, mourning), and having his head covered, as one that is ashamed to be seen and recognised, and he related to his family what had happened.

How different was the scene in that house from that described in chap. v. 11 ! At that time he was inflated with recounting his successes, his influence, his favours,—and only one anxious thought troubled him, how to get rid of the obnoxious Mordecai who sat at the gate,—but now he fully realized shame, vexation, and disappointment, which far overbalanced his former enjoyments. Then it appeared so easy to put Mordecai out of the way ; but now he is not only still alive, but is recognised and registered as a benefactor of the king, and who had triumphed over him in the presence of all the inhabitants of the city. All the members of his family hung down their heads. It was an unheard-of disaster.

Ver. 13. “ Then said his wise men and Zeresh his wife unto him, If Mordecai, before whom thou hast begun to fall, be of the Jews,” etc.

How much worldly wisdom and admonition does this verse contain, especially when we compare it with chap. v. 14 ! On the former occasion of the party gathering, Zeresh was the first boldly to advise the immediate execution of Mordecai, and the “ adherents ” only chimed in, while nothing was said of the wise men. But now the adherents are silent, Zeresh is in the background, and the wise men are the speakers. Among a class of men such as are gathered here, it is not principle or conscience which decides a point, but the measure of its success. When Haman was successful, everything that he did was considered wise by them, but now they have not even a word of comfort for him. At that time they instigated him, now they blame him. Did they not then know that Mordecai was a Jew ? Had not Haman expressly told them so ? Now they act as if they hear it for the first time ! What else was the cause of Haman's disgrace but their advice ! Why did not they then moderate his temper by saying, "Never mind Mordecai, let him sit,"—but they urged him on to hang him at once. Had this not been done, the present occurrence would not have turned out so badly for Haman. He would not have been present on that morning at the palace. Another person would have had to discharge the irksome business. But of this neither his wife nor his friends take any notice, they again pretend to be wise as before. We could have told thee at once, they say, what the result would be, "Why hast thou begun with that fellow ?" And Haman is in that evil state of falling out of the frying-pan into the fire of his false and self-righteous friends. Remarkable is the expression הכטוי, "his wise men." It seems in itself to indicate the irony of the narrator. Fine wise men were these ! They ought to have given him better advice before ! Of what avail is the announcement to him now ? But the mentioning of the "Hhahhamim," who were with Haman, contains also an instructive significance. That Haman's whole position was a quasi-spiritual one, belonging to Parseeism, we have already attempted to show above. This accounts for his being surrounded in his high office by other such Magi, who are sometimes called הברים and sometimes "wise men," like the priests of Egypt, to whose office belonged divination and astrology, as we have seen above. But their wisdom consisted in their superstition in results. Only just now they find a reason for their ominous prophecy.

But what causes them to declare that because Haman has fallen before Mordecai, he will always continue to fall ? The misfortune which has befallen him appears to them as a bad omen. The Jews, thought they, are his enemies ; he has undertaken a dreadful work against them ; whether it will succeed or not, no one can tell. But now this misfortune has happened to Haman. If it begins so, prophesies superstition, it must go on in the same way to the end. Mordecai is a Jew ; and if he is unfortunate with him as an individual, it is a sure prognostication that he will be equally and more so in his attempt against all the Jews. The conclusion they come to is not with regard to the Jews per se, but only in so far as the experience in the case of the individual Jew Mordecai leads them to infer what will be Haman's fate with regard to the whole nation. This is pure belief in fetishism. When Indians have to remove a heap of stones, if before they proceed to the task they are hurt by one stone, they will leave the stone and abstain from the work altogether. Of the high morality, according to which Haman as an intriguing traitor and murderer must fall, they were not in the least conscious. Superstition, of course, has not seldom carnal forebodings that are fulfilled in the spirit. In fact, the God of Israel is a living God, who, because righteousness and truth are His attributes, reveals them unto men, especially unto those who trust in Him that He will not give them over to destruction. Not because Haman fell the first time he will continue to fall, but he began to fall because the time of judgment had come. Universal history bears testimony that persecutions of believers never brought a blessing to the persecutors. The saying of the wise men of Haman has an important comforting truth far above their knowledge and understanding ; only not in the national and carnal sense in which the Jews understood it, but in the extensive sense that "Blessed are they that have been persecuted for righteousness' sake : for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. v. 10). No one will prosper who wantonly persecutes innocent witnesses of the truth. Hamans have never been wanting, but they have all fallen.

Ver. 14. "While they were yet talking with him, came the king's chamberlains."

Behold, their gloomy conversation is yet dispelled for a while by a ray from the sun. Royal messengers yet come to the house, and bring a new invitation to Haman to come in haste to the queen's banquet. He is still accompanied by a royal retinue through the city to the palace. Mordecai may see that there is not yet an end of Haman.—But he saw him for the last time. It was but a deceiving lustre. Destruction lay beneath it. He was fetched in order to be held more securely. Probably Esther had heard what had happened to him, and feared he might not come. What took place in the morning encourages her for the act at noon. They were still (מִשְׁׁוּעָי) speaking of the misfortune when the message arrived, in consequence of which he so shamefully fell, to rise no more.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1. "So the king and Haman came to banquet," etc.

We have here a repetition of what was told in chap. v. 5, but this repetition is for a very significant reason. Esther wants to make an experiment at the table with the king and Haman, which will be decisive of life or death.¹ If she succeeds, then her people are saved; if she fails, then she is lost too. The invitation to the second banquet is not in vain. Observing the changeable mood of the tyrant, she tries first to ascertain whether the kindly disposition which he has shown towards her on the former occasion still continues. And she was not disappointed. He asked her, as at the first time, to express her wish, whatever it might be. He treated her now with the same tenderness as he did then. But she had also during the interval received some tokens of encouragement. Haman's humiliation had in the meantime taken place. It was now known that his position with the king was not so unassailable after all. Esther had seen that Ahhashverosh himself had really no antipathy against the Jews, otherwise how could he have conferred such high honour upon Mordecai, and that through the medium of Haman? It was now clear to her that every persecution that was started against the Jews was only an intrigue of Haman, of which the king, properly speaking, knew nothing. All this was revealed by the wonderful night in which the king could not sleep.—Esther saw in this the hand of her God, stretched out to render assistance in the time of need, and she was inspired by new courage.

Ver. 3. “Then Esther the queen answered.”

Her reply shows a decided and determined tone,—“Now, if thou art fully in earnest with thy kindness, and thou really wishest to show me a favour, know that my heart has no desire for playthings, my petition does not crave for female pleasures, I do not ask for money or for dress,—I have no court intrigues and eunuch stories to speak of with thee, but of a matter upon whose issue depends life or death, shame and destruction. Thou expectest, O king, a petition which shall supply thee with pleasure and amusement; I must speak of such things as will excite thee to the uttermost. Thou sittest at table and art desirous to be merry, but I bring a petition before thee which will cause thee pain. But thou hast promised me to grant my petition; then spare my life, which I fear is at stake. Thou hast expressed a willingness to fulfil my wishes; then give me the life of my people.” The royal feast becomes all at once a tragical scene. The king listens, is astounded, and becomes excited; Esther begs for her life. Who besides himself can threaten it? Who dares to threaten her whom he cherishes and loves? All in the dining-hall are dumb-struck and trembling. The king’s brow is clouded; while Esther with her calm and plaintive eloquence, which the occasion and the subject have inspired, looks handsomer and more dignified than before. The force of her tremulous voice the author portrays in reproducing her speech in an abrupt form. It should have been, “If I have found favour in thy sight, O king, and if it please the king to grant my request (לֹתָה אֶת שְׁאַלְתִּי), let my life,” etc.; but she in her excitement puts life before petition, and people before request.

Ver. 4. “For we are sold.”

“There was a bargain made about us, and that for the purpose of our being destroyed, slain, and annihilated." The words לְהַשְׁמִיד לְהַרְגֵּן לְאָבֶד do not exactly represent a climax, but show that Esther chose the strongest words she could find with which to express the fate of her people. שֹׁמֶד, to destroy, by removing a thing out of sight; אָבֶד, to let a thing perish by plucking it out by the root, and that, too, by slaughter, therefore the word להרג is added. But notwithstanding Esther's excited feelings, which were natural to her under the circumstances, we must not overlook the fact that she made a masterly calculation of the nature of her husband, and ordered her language accordingly. She does not say to whom she and her people were sold, nor does she name the people that were sold. She places herself in the front, and says: "I and my people." For she has to do with a fickle man, whose will is governed and determined by his momentary passion and humour. There is nothing to be gained by a mere plea on the point of justice involved in the question. Here the heart, the vain heart, is required to be inflamed by representations which might flatter his fancy of possessing unlimited power. She must not say that he has sold her, for what he has done must be well! and she must take care not to assail him. Therefore she does not even name the sold people,—perhaps he is reminded of his own deed; and the Jews are too desppicable to him. So she mentions herself first,—for at this moment she was more valuable to him than a whole people; that she was sold, whom the king loves so much that he generously offers her half of his empire; that she was sold, whose beauty just now at the table fascinates more than ever. This is what she emphasizes, and whereby she seeks to win the tyrant. "I and my people," she says. The impression of the speech gains all its force from the insertion of the personal pronoun. The people do not suffer for her sake, nor she for the people's sake. She who belongs to the king, and whom he loves, is sold. Who can dare to sell his wife? Yea, even so much as to estimate the value of the person he loves! He wants to give her half of his kingdom, if she desires it; and she begs him with bitter tears to save her from the death to which she is sold. “To be sold” was, besides, an expression applicable only to slaves. Quintilian says (viii. 1): “As under the term city (urbs) is understood Rome, so by the term venales are understood slaves.” When Roxolana got to be the favourite of the Turkish Sultan Suleiman, she was reproached by her envious rival with being carne venduta, “sold flesh.” Roxolana then called herself so before the sultan, as an excuse for no longer approaching him, for as “sold flesh” she considered herself unworthy to do so; and this contributed to her complete victory over her rival (Hammer, Gesch. des osman. Reiches, iii. 728).

This turn in Esther’s plea is still more beautiful and impressive. One cannot represent in a few words the whole of the rare position of a Persian shah. “If it were nothing further,” she says, “but that we had been sold as slaves, our lives would then be spared, and we could entertain the hope of eventually regaining our liberty,—in that case I should not trouble thee so much. It would not have been worth while to disturb thee just now and spoil thy appetite.” For these pregnant words, although the adversary could not have compensated the king’s damage, בַּנְזֵק הַמֶּלֶךְ (or R. V. “for our affliction is not to be compared with the king’s damage”), are calculated to flatter the Persian tyrant. True, צָר means “enemy,” but in the abstract also “distress,” “tribulation,” “misfortune;” and even if it is insisted that the article points to the enemy, still it must be conceded that the emphasis cannot be on the person, but, as it is a participial form, rather upon the act of the enemy. For “the adversary” is no other in the second than in the first,—it is always the same Haman,—but the mischief would be of another character if it were only to end in slavery. The word צָר, therefore, means the evil which the evil one has done to Israel. Esther’s meaning is as follows: “The enemy, or the enmity, if it threatens such things to us, would not have been considered of sufficient value (שׁוֹן) to disturb the king (בְּנֵאָק הַמֶּלֶךְ).” True, indeed, that רָנוֹת has the meaning of damage, and may radically be compared with nocere; and, in fact, is used in Ezra (iv. 13) to denote the damage done to the revenue, and other acts of enmity to the king. And yet it cannot be here, as some have supposed, that Esther meant to convey to the king that she and her people would rather suffer slavery than cause him any pecuniary damage; for in both cases, whether they were sold to be killed or into slavery, pecuniary damage must ensue. But in the flattering language of the etiquette of the Persian court, to disturb the king was tantamount to damage or injure the king. When the king was disturbed in the enjoyment of his dinner by being called to pass judgment upon sad cases, it was considered as an injury done to him. Esther nevertheless does it—only because her life and the existence of her people are at stake. She would have rather gone into slavery than cast a gloom upon the joyous hours of the king. But she cannot act otherwise. She is compelled to speak out. With this explanation agrees that of an African Rabbi, quoted by Ibn Ezra in his commentary on this book (ed. Zedner, London 1850, p. 29). One reading of this passage in the LXX. is indeed remarkable: οὐ γὰρ ἀξιος ὁ διάβολος τῆς αὐλῆς τοῦ βασιλέως, for αὐλή certainly does not mean here the court of the king, but is a Greek form of the Hebrew אֲלֵיָה, viz. “the injustice,” “the evil deed,” against the king.

Ver. 5. “Then spake the king.”

The words of Esther could not fail to produce the desired impression. They were so forcible and so full of good sense. She spoke from the depth of her heart, and yet with full discretion. Her high position as the beloved wife of the king, her beautiful appearance, her graceful manners, her heart-rending plea, her bitter tears, and above all the justice of her cause, called forth sympathy mingled with indignation from every impartial heart; and the king's wrath was specially kindled, seeing she had touched the delicate spring of his immeasurable vanity. For he knew of nothing. He had long ago forgotten the thoughtless grant that he had made to Haman in one of his capricious moods, and if memory still served him, he was quite certain that the sale of the queen formed no item in the contract, and that her name was not even mentioned on that occasion. And now he sees that the whole scheme was after all designed to deprive him of her. Undoubtedly it was an intrigue which caused Vashti's fall, but she had to some extent brought it upon herself by her disobedience, and he was not present when she was sentenced; and yet how sorry he afterwards was for his rash deed. But now somebody, without his knowledge, sells his wife to death,—his wife who is so obedient and so loving. One sees in these words that the narrator describes the king's anger, in that he repeats the word מִרְאֵת, “And the king Ahhashverosh spake and said to Queen Esther.”

This question expresses his burning indignation. There is some one who dares that—who is he? Where in my kingdom does the man live who has the audacity to act thus towards me, whose heart is full, i.e. whose heart is filled with such impudence as to do so?¹ The LXX. pretty nearly reproduces the sense by ἐτόλμησε, “that durst presume” to do so. Arnheim renders it freely, “who had the haughtiness,” etc. The first Targum exaggerates his excitement still more, by representing him as saying, “Who is the audacious, the criminal, the rebel, who ventures to do this?” Esther, impelled by the trouble of her heart, and noticing that the king was inclined to do her justice, gains confidence, and without regarding the presence of him whom it concerns, freely speaks her mind.

Ver. 6. “An adversary and an enemy,¹ even this wicked Haman.”

“That one after whom thou inquirest, the oppressor and enemy, the one who wants to murder me and my people, who has sold me—now, with flashing eye and angry mien she lifts her finger and points to her guest, ‘that Haman !’—he is not far from here; we need not seek him; he sits at our side, that man there—Haman is this wicked one !” It is a dramatic scene beyond comparison. Haman’s blood runs cold. Such a storm he had never anticipated. How should he know that Esther was a Jewess ? Had he known it, he would have adopted quite different measures. To defend himself now he knew was impossible. The faces of both, of the king and of the queen, deterred him. He knew well how the king looked when he was angry.

The Oriental legends frequently describe the dreadful look which Harun-Arrashid assumed when he detected a piece of roguery. Abdolmelik, king of Damascus, says one of these legends, did not make the slightest movement. He was quite like one petrified. Harun assumed all at once such a dreadful tone, that the unfortunate prince gave up his throne not so much on account of obedience, but on account of the terror which overwhelmed him. The surprise made him stiff and benumbed.² נִכְעַת, from בָּעֵת, to become “alarmed,” “terrified,” figuratively and really φοβεῖν.

Ver. 7. “And the king arose in his wrath.”

The king was so angry that he did not speak a word, still less did he give Haman the opportunity to speak. Excessive blind wrath generally follows tyrannical conceit. In the same proportion in which Oriental tyranny permits itself to make superabundant grants, is its blind wrath when its infatuated vanity is offended. The Oriental legendary world is full of representations of pure downright passion, which, against whomsoever it may be directed, whether he deserves it or not, is thought to be so natural, that it is to the Oriental mind an adornment of the most ideal king. Upon the quality of relentless passion are founded the Eastern novels and stories about various catastrophes, and sons and wives and viziers are its habitual victims. That which befell Haman here was experienced by Hikar, the most virtuous of all viziers, as is told in a very instructive Arabic narrative. Intrigue knows usually how to excite jealousy and anger, and an investigation concerning the right or wrong of the accused is considered unnecessary.

² See The Thousand and One Nights, ed. Leipzig 1790, i. 124 and 407.

הַמָּח, “heated fury.” The king became hot on account of glowing excitement. Rosenmüller has collected some examples to show that when an Oriental king rises angry from the table, then there is no mercy for him who was the cause of it (Morgenland zu Buch Esther, No. 718). The sense is that the king withdraws his favour from him, as the sun departs. His going away means the same as the vanishing of the sun, the cessation of the light of mercy and of life. The royal dining-hall was close to the garden of the palace, whither the king went as a sign of his being angry, and to cool himself.¹

“And Haman stood up to make request for his life.”

Haman read his fall in the face and in the movements of the king. But as he was haughty when prosperous, so now he is without manliness in ruin. He falls upon his knees before his accuser to beg for life. He is not ashamed to ask mercy of her whose people he wanted to kill without mercy. He lies at her feet, to whom he owes his sudden crushing defeat, crying and sobbing for help. He beseeches her to save him, who had just now called him a traitor and an enemy. Of course he could have said that he did not then know that she was a Jewess, and that his proposal had no reference to her. But how could this plea move Esther's compassion, when all the efforts she had thus far made were in behalf of her people? But seeing that she alone has influence with the king, he cringes before her after the manner of knavish cowards, who do not mind begging from any and everybody if they think they will get what they want. They do not blush, for they are destitute of self-respect. And so Haman lies prostrate before Esther's feet crying for mercy, and not minding the contemptuous and wrathful glance which she deigns to cast upon him. Esther would not and could not forgive him.—To speak a good word for him now, if she were disposed to do so, would be to undo the whole work that she has done. The angry king feels himself deeply offended. Who should now save Haman? While he is still kneeling near the divan upon which Esther sits, the king returns from his walk in the garden and finds him in this posture. It is quite true what Plutarch (Themist. 26) tells of the jealousy of the Persian kings with regard to their wives, but the words which the king addresses to Haman, "Will he even force¹ the queen before me in the house?" do not contain jealousy, which would be absurd, but biting irony. It cannot be mercy, thinks the king, that thou seekest from her whom thou hast so atrociously offended; thou canst have no hope that she would forgive thee; so it may be that thou art so audacious as to lay hold of my wife

in an unwarrantable manner! He that could be so bold as to devise a plan for killing my own wife, who could abuse my confidence in order to betray the love of the king, such a man is quite capable of making an indecent assault upon the queen in my presence! In these awful ironical words lay the sentence of death for Haman. They manifest the fury of the king, who does not stop to consider that Haman was unaware of the origin of Esther, nor does he think of the people whose lives were at stake, but only of the audacity which could make his wife an object of hatred. And this irony contained an accusation against Haman, which was in itself enough to procure the forfeiture of his life. Therefore scarcely had the words escaped the king's lips when Haman's face was covered. The covering of the face of a criminal arose from the idea that he is henceforth no more worthy to behold the light of which the king was an emblem. That with which he was previously only threatened when the king went out to the garden,—when the sun departed,—he is now made to realize after the king's return,—he must see the sun no more. He is a guilty criminal, and has no more right to see the sun. Guilt is in itself defilement like death.¹ The voluntary covering of one's own face is different from its being covered by another. Mourners do it spontaneously, because they feel as if under judgment; but when the faces of others are compulsorily covered, it is a sign to them of judgment, to intimate to them that they are condemned. The first do not want to see the light, the second no longer need it. The explanation of Ibn Ezra, that it was customary to cover a man's face who had provoked the king, is correct. To this effect the reference of Curtius is also a happy one, who reports that when Philotas was seized by order of

Alexander, he was brought with covered face to the place of the king (velato capite ad regiam) (vi. 22. 8). We are even informed further that this was done with an old rag (obsoleto amiculo), while his hands were tied to his back. Therefore Cicero rightly ascribes the origin of the formula, "Lictor, tie his hands, cover his face, hang him on the accursed tree," to the time of the Roman kings, as he thinks to Tarquinius (superbissimi et crudelissimi regis) (Pro Cajo Rabirio, p. 3, etc.).

In fact, as Livius (i. 26) informs us, this punishment was already applied under Tullus Hostilius to Horatius, on account of the patriotic murder of his sister. His father pleaded for him, saying, "Should the hands which have shortly before carried arms and obtained dominion for the Roman people be tied? Should the face of the liberator of this city be covered?" So Horatius is sentenced to pass with covered face under a beam as under a yoke. The covering of the face signified his guilt.¹

This evidently was also the theological ground in the practice among the Romans to pray, and to offer sacrifices with covered heads.² By this, a sense of guilt was acknowledged and confessed; and Plutarch's explanation, that the Romans did this to humble themselves, is the right one, while other explanations are flat and constrained, and only rarely applicable. Tertullian (Apolog. cap. 30) rightly says: "We pray with uncovered head, because we are not ashamed," —i.e. Christians pray without fear, not as condemned, but as reconciled,—“for love casteth out fear.” Naturally this is also the meaning of the words of the apostle when he says that a man should not have his head covered, whatever the covering may be, when he is praying or prophesying ($\pi\rho\sigma\varepsilon\nu\chi\acute{\mu}\varepsilon\nu\sigma$ ή $\pi\rho\phi\eta\tau\varepsilon\nu\omega\nu$), for Christ is his head. The doctrine was not, as Oosterzee thinks, against the custom of the Romans, but more particularly against that of the Jews. Not only the later Jews, as he says (on 1 Cor. xi. 4, p. 107), had this practice, but it existed from time immemorial (as in the case of Moses at the bush), and especially at the time of Christ and the apostles. The theological idea contained at that time in the covering of the head during prayer is proved from the use of the word $\pi\tau\mu$ in connection with prayer, which the Psalmist employs to express "covering the face in sorrow, or being overwhelmed with affliction" (Ps. lxxvii. 4, cvii. 5). The act of covering of the face in the case of a mourner was in itself not different from that of a suppliant. In both the feeling of repentance is presupposed to exist. The mourners in this way bemoan only one object of temporal loss, while the suppliants have in view the whole relation of man towards God. When we read in Moed Katan 24a, "Every covering which is not as the covering of Ishmaelites (pre-Mohamedan) is not a covering," it refers not only to mourners, as Levy thinks (Chald. Wörterbuch, ii. p. 210), but to prayer in general (comp. Sefer Agur, ed. Venez. 1516, p. 4a). And this covering consisted in putting on the Talith (praying garment), and did not exclude the proper covering of the head. Hence we read in Tract Shabbath 10a: "He put it on, covered himself, wrapped himself up ($\pi\tau\mu\tau\mu\tau\mu$), and prayed." This practice went so far that it became indispensable to every religious and spiritual act, so much so, that even God in heaven was pictured as a Rabbi covered ($\pi\tau\mu\tau$) with a garment as white as snow (Targum on Song of Solomon, v. 10), and as it is added, "He studied during the day the law and the prophets, and during the night the Mishna" (Eisenmenger, i. p. 6).¹

² Comp. Brisson, de formulis, i. 32, but the custom is not there explained. When Suetonius (Vitellius, cap. 2) reports that Vitellius, after his return from Syria, adored the king "Velato capite," it was not necessarily an Oriental practice, but rather the flatterer rendered homage to the emperor in the same way as was done to the gods.

In the dreadful words which the king uttered to Haman, the courtiers perceived the sentence of his condemnation. He was covered.

Ver. 9. “Then said Harbonah,” etc.

When courtiers are unsuccessful, then all their glory is at an end.¹ Former jealousy breaks now out in open hostility. Former cowardice gives place to bold accusation. Haman’s manner and conduct was of such a haughty character as to preclude his making loyal friends who would stick to him in misfortune. Besides, Harbonah may not have been one of his friends at all. The scene took place in the apartments of the queen. Harbonah was one of her eunuchs, who belonged to her party, and now supports her victory by his remark. The word וְ also is explained by modern commentators (Bertheau and Keil) in such a way as to imply that Harbonah added to what other eunuchs had said. But this is erroneous. It is most characteristic. The accusation of Esther against Haman was that he had sold her with her people. This embittered the king the more, that he had presumed to sell his wife. He considered it as the highest act of treason. And so Harbonah adds: “It is not this offence alone that he has committed, but he has also conspired against the life of Mordecai, who has saved his majesty’s life, and who has just now been honoured by the king.² Haman was quite ready to execute him on the gallows fifty cubits high.” The word “also” (וְ) refers then not to Harbonah’s speech, but to Haman’s treachery against the king and his friends. It is very curious that, as in chap. iv. so here, the name of Jews is passed over in silence. It is not said that the people who have been sold are Jews, nor does Harbonah say, as it stands elsewhere, “Mordecai the Jew.” For it does not at all matter to what nationality they belong—it is not a question about certain persons, but a royal question which is dealt with here. Haman's offence consisted in wanting to slay the king's wife and the king's friends—this is accentuated. The Midrash (Yalkut Shimeoni, n. 1059) has a remarkable comment on this verse. Under Harbonah is to be understood the prophet Elijah, who assumed his appearance in order to effect Haman's death. They thought that חרבונה is derived from חרב, “sword.” Haman is a type of Israel's adversary (Samael), of whom Jewish tradition says that he will at last be killed by Elijah. In the same way, in patristic writings, Elijah is represented as the great opponent of Antichrist at the last day (see the fragment attributed to Lactantius in Baluzii Miscell., ed. Mansi, i. 12).¹

² [Therefore in the liturgy for Purim it is said: “Harbonah also is to be remembered for good.”—TRANS.]

“And the king said: Hang him thereon.”

הָלַח means “to hang.” The passage in Deut. xxi. 22 is well known: “And if a man have committed a sin worthy of death, and he be put to death, and thou hang him on a tree (עַל הַעֲלִית אֹתוֹ וְתִלֵּת לְלִבָּנָה), his body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt surely bury him the same day; for he that is hanged (חָלֵךְ) is accursed of God: that thou defile not thy land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance.” The condemned was drawn up upon a beam and nailed to it. This was a common mode of punishment among the Persians. The Greek writers when they mention it call it ἀνασταυρόειν, ἀνασταυροῦν.

The wood was called σταυρός. So narrates Ctesias, that the king had caused Inaros to be hung, ἀνεσταύρωσε ἐπὶ τρισὶ σταυροῖς;² the same expression is used by Thucydides, ἀνεσταυρώθη (comp. Bähr, zu Ctesiae Rell. p. 176). What is expressed by ἀνά is reproduced in the Hebrew idiom by נָלַח, “to hang,” as the beam was usually high, as is here expressly stated. Haman had one prepared fifty cubits high, in order that the condemned might be seen from a distance, and this fell upon his own head.

Haman's fate has a parallel in modern history. Henry V. of England had laid siege to Meaux in France, where the cruel commander had hung all the English prisoners. So, after the king had taken the city, he caused him to be hung on the same scaffold (Mensel, Geschichte von Frankreich, ii. 455). When, therefore, the Jews call Christ a חלץ, there can be no objection to it as far as the letter is concerned, as it is the translation of crucifixus, "the crucified." But the objection is that they use the word as a term of reproach, "But we preach Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to Greeks foolishness," etc. (1 Cor. i. 23). When the Jews also used, on the feast of Purim, to represent Haman as crucified, the act contained a historical truth, although the suspicion in ancient times may not have been without foundation, that they also mocked thereby the suffering of Christ; therefore the Roman emperors issued in 408 an edict against it, as follows: "Judaeos quodam festivitatis suae solemini Aman ad poenae quondam recordationem incendere et sanctae crucis assimulatam speciem in contemptum Christianae fidei sacrilega mente exurere" (Cod. Theod., lib. xvi. tit. 8. 18).

The allegory which the Jews have in connection with this occasion is interesting. It is told in the second Targum that when Haman was about to be hanged in the garden, he complained to the trees that he was to be hanged on one of them, and especially on one which was fifty cubits high. So the vine, the Paradise-apple, the oak, and the pomegranate refused out of pious motives to be used for that purpose. The oak even averred that it could not have any one hung upon itself, because it had served as a scaffold to Absalom, the son of David. Then the cedar came and offered itself, in order that he may have the required height. But later homilies have taken away this office from the cedar, and given it to the thorn bush, in order that it also may serve a purpose in God's creation. "For equals meet together, one thorn should lie upon another thorn." The wicked are compared to thorns (Mezahh Aaron, p. 47). There is in this no doubt a hidden reference to the thorns of Christ. According to another allegory, when Haman was looking for the tree on which to hang Mordecai, and on which he was hanged himself, he could find no other but the fir tree for this purpose. In this is seen a German allegory. The fir is used as a Christmas tree; the Jews called Christmas לְבָנָה,¹ which properly comes from natalis (festum natale); but it admits a secondary meaning of "hanging" (הַלְקָה), by way of polemical play upon words.

Ver. 10. "Then was the king's wrath pacified."

The remark is important for the statement that follows. In chap. ii. 1, after Vashti was removed, we read: "When the wrath of the king Ahhashverosh was pacified, he remembered Vashti!" He was sorry for her. But now—and on this the following is a commentary—his wrath is subdued; but Haman's fate caused him no sorrow, and this was fortunate for Esther and the Jews. The king's order was not yet revoked, and was still impending over their heads, and it would not have been difficult to find adherents of Haman who would have walked in his footsteps. The decision had only begun with the fall of Haman. If his execution had only been caused by the momentary anger of the king, the Jews would still have perished. Their destiny and that of Esther depended now on what the king was going to do after he calmed down.

¹ [This word is used by the Jerusalem Targum on Ex. xxx. 19: "Aaron and his sons shall wash." When applied to Christmas, it must announce to the Rabbis the glad tidings that Jesus came into the world to cleanse and to save sinners.—TRANS.]

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1. "On that day did the king Ahhashverosh give the house of Haman, the Jews' enemy, unto Esther the queen."

What is here narrated occurs numberless times in the histories of Oriental kingdoms. The will of the shah is law. What his servants possess, they have only through him. And this is also to some extent the case with their life. When they are to be punished their possession returns to him. The fall of a man like Haman is always considered in the light of a war—what he possesses is spoil. Haman falls, so his house is confiscated when the king wills it. When Sultan Suleiman caused the mighty vizier of the Turkish empire, his own brother-in-law, Ibrahim, to be strangled, he confiscated all his property, which was worth millions. And so when Shah Abbas ordered the execution of a certain prominent man on account of his haughtiness, Chardin, who informs us of it, adds: "I do not now say that the king put all his property under seal, because I believe I have said more than once, that the confiscation of goods almost invariably follows the loss of life, when it is lost by the order of the sovereign." The king Ahhashverosh confiscates Haman's house, not for himself, but for Esther. She and Haman carried on war between them, and she had conquered through the favour of the king, therefore she receives the war booty.

"And Mordecai came before the king."

He had not come before the king when the king had learned from the chronicle that he had saved his life. Now he comes as Esther's uncle. It was now universally known to what nationality she belonged. She had therefore no longer any cause to conceal the facts, that her connection with the Jew Mordecai was of long standing, that he had brought her up, and that she had heard from him about the dangerous condition of her people. It made no difference to the king that she was a Jewess, for not the peculiarities of his subjects, but his own will was law (as is the case with all Oriental sultans). It was enough for him that Mordecai was her relation, that she liked him, and that he had obtained his favour.

He took off his ring and gave it to Mordecai, just as he did before to Haman. He gave the property of the defeated party to the conqueror. The persecutor (צור) had fallen, and the persecuted came into power. The arbitrariness of the monarch became the instrument of retaliation. This also will not be strange to those who read Oriental history. In a story of the history of Harun Arrashid it is told that the governor of a prison was once though innocent punished by the governor of the State, and when his innocence was proved, he was set as inspector over his persecutor (ed. Habicht, xiii. 20). Abbas ordered Murchidealichan to be killed; and made his groom, who helped in the execution, governor of Herat in his place (Olearius in Meissner, p. 114).

The change was in itself radically not different from what takes place in modern constitutional States. In the place of the outgoing minister comes the leader of the opposition. Only here a matter of principle or ambition is involved in the change, but there a matter of life. In Europe it came to be a sign of the limited power of the monarch, while in the East it was a sign of the unlimited power of the shah.

Ver. 2. “And Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman.”

It was given her as a present from the king, for she stood at the head of those against whom Haman conspired. But she cannot be the vizier, and so she nominates her uncle to the office. Therefore she gives him the house of Haman. He requires not only to have the ring, but also the property of Haman, as the same grandeur which Haman possessed is necessary to his (Mordecai's) position. Esther rewards Mordecai for the love she had received from him. She is not only a zealous daughter of Israel, but has also a grateful heart. Through the education which she received from him she was qualified to become a queen, and therefore in return he must become her husband's vizier. But, with all this, she had not forgotten the higher motive which was far above personal triumphs.

It never occurred to the king that all was not yet finished with the hanging of Haman. He saw that there was war between Esther and his minister. The latter had fallen in disgrace, for the king felt that he had assailed his sovereignty, and now he thought that all was at an end. It was not for the sake of the Jews that he had made such an exhibition of his anger, but in vindication of his own authority. Now the death of Haman had appeased him, and he took no further trouble. But the queen could not yet be satisfied with his condemnation. For what she had dared and done was not so much to procure the fall of Haman, as the deliverance of Israel. That Mordecai had the ring and the house of Haman given to him could not satisfy her. The cruel decree was still impending over Israel. It was yet in full force though Haman was dead. And as long as this was not repealed, the triumph of Mordecai and herself could not be complete.

Ver. 3. "And Esther spake yet again before the king."

She was not content with what she obtained in her first audience with the king at the banquet. She besought him again (רִקְבָּה) to grant her a second audience. And she knew well that this would be more difficult than the first, for the very reason that the first was so successful. The means which she on that occasion used could not be used again. She could not invite to another banquet. To take the king by surprise again was impossible. For this he had only given her one opportunity. The personal consideration which induced him to grant the former interview was now wanting. The entertainment of tyrants becomes soon tedious when no character of novelty is introduced into it; they soon think they have had enough of it. The second appearance of Esther before the king was therefore more difficult and of more doubtful result than the first. She makes also now—as the narrator takes no pains to conceal—more exertions, in order that she may impress the king.

She did not do so the first time. But at that time she did not know how much regard and affection the king had for her. And a weeping woman cannot invite to a feast. But now she knew that he loved her. One does not resist the tears of a beloved wife. And so she beseeches him even weeping, that he, the gracious and powerful, may now undo the evil (הַעֲבֵד) of the evil one (עָבֵד), viz. “the device that Haman had devised against the Jews.” It is true that he is dead, but the arrow which he has thrown is still deadly poisonous. And she does not now say, as before, “we are sold,” lest she should be misunderstood as if she was only anxious for personal freedom; but she entreats his help against the plan that threatens the Jews in general. This name was not even mentioned in the former conversation; but now, since it is known that she is a relative of Mordecai the Jew, she has courage to name them in the third person. The narrative indicates nicety of style, in that she is not represented as saying: “to do away the device which Haman had devised against us.” For it would have been offensive to the king to entertain the idea that a plan of the execrable Haman could have touched the queen. The result of Esther’s petition was still doubtful. She could not rely upon the humour of the Persian shah. During the interval between the fall of Haman and her present interview various influences might have been brought to bear upon the king’s mind. But she was mistaken in her fears. The king again held out the golden sceptre, as a sign that he regarded her graciously; and she recognised in this that he was favourably inclined to hear what she had further to ask of him.

Ver. 4. "So Esther arose, and stood before the king."

As a suppliant she knelt, but in consequence of his favour she stood up as his wife, and more accurately formulated her petition. The speech which she now makes is a masterpiece of that prudence and humility with which the person of the shah must be addressed. The first words, "If it please the king, and if I have found favour in his sight," are, as it appears, the usual form of addressing the king. Similarly she spake to him on the former occasion; but now, bearing in mind the difficult matter that she had to lay before him, she adds, "and the thing seems right (כש) before the king." This adjective occurs only here, but in later Hebrew of the Targum and the Talmud we meet with it frequently. The verb is etymologically cognate with ישר, אישר, meaning "right," "proper;" but the special sense in which כש is used here, is the same as in later times. The Rabbis in the Talmud called that "kasher" which was permitted from a religious point of view. In the same sense Esther understands the word if the thing appears to the king such as, for his person, for his position and conscience, seems proper and allowable. She herself passes no judgment upon it,—this is his privilege, and he will in his wisdom know whether what she demands, is permissible and right. Then she goes on to say, "And I be pleasing (טובה), good, in his eyes." The word "good" is purposely chosen by her. According to the religious dualism of the Persian teaching, Ahriman is the evil, and Ahuramazda is the good god. Evil was therefore against the light and against the king, who represented the doctrine of Ahuramazda. Evil was the king's enemy, and good was the devoted adherent of the king. When Esther accuses Haman, she calls him חָרָע, "the evil one;" and in contrast to this she says now, “And if I be good in his eyes ;” if the king loves me, and I appear as pleasing, submissive, and attached. She prays him for the sake of the love which he has for her—but, of course, after ascertaining that her demand is right—that he should invalidate and revoke the edict, and destroy the letters (סִפְרָה, “scroll,” “letter,” and “book” as literae) which contain Haman’s device to annihilate the Jews. She adds wisely that they are מחשבת, the machination of Haman, for in themselves they were the letters of the king; and therefore she guards herself against implying that she meant that the king’s own work should be destroyed. Nothing of the kind. For she knows well that a royal edict cannot be revoked, and therefore she puts into the king’s mouth a different interpretation of the character of the letters. They are entirely Haman’s work, of which the king knew nothing originally; they had been smuggled in, and therefore he can revoke them. When she adds : “son of Hamedatha the Agagite,” it must be, as already remarked, in allusion to his relation to a certain party, which makes it more detestable in the eyes of the king.

Ver. 6. “How can I endure to see ?” etc.

With rhetorical skill and force she continues to move his heart. “Say not, O king, that thy favour protects my life,—that is doubtless true,—but I have not prayed merely for myself,—and how could I live in peace and enjoyment while my poor people is slain ; how unbearable would be to me thy favour and glory, if I should have to witness the disaster which befell my own kindred ; how should I be ashamed to be something to thee, when in spite of it I should have to look at the destruction of the nation which gave me birth !” (She uses the word מוֹלֵדָה for nation, from מַלְדָּה, as natio is from nascor.) She says, “endure to see,” without being able to help. Thus she gives the king clearly to understand that she would be powerless and helpless, although she is the beloved queen ; and this powerlessness would be a reflection upon him. She effectively shows him the contrast between the favour that he had shown to her and Mordecai, and her possible helplessness in not being able to save her brethren from death and plunder. What would the people say, and what would be the general popular opinion if they should see that the great favourites of the king are inactive while their people suffer? Could Esther endure that people should say of her, that she was sitting and enjoying herself in the harem, and looking with indifference at the destruction of Israel? If so, thy favour, she gives him to understand, would be worse than thy wrath. The adherents of Haman will avenge themselves on Mordecai and on us by killing the Jews before our eyes. Not Haman but we would be the most unfortunate. His death would be better than our life. For it is better to die with the others than to live in sorrow and contempt. "My people and I have not fasted and prayed that I should live, but that they should live. My life is in thy hands. Save the poor people."

Vers. 7, 8. "Then the king Ahhashverosh said to Esther the queen," etc.

The answer of the king manifests dignity and kindness at the same time. He pacifies the excited Esther, and yet maintains his royal attitude. It is difficult to see why Clericus finds the answer obscure. His language is clear; a revocation of the edict is impossible; a rescript issued in the name of the king and sealed by his seal cannot be made void under any pretext whatever.¹ And this rests upon the idea that a "decree," מְרַגֵּשׁ, is ideally to be looked upon in the light of an emanation from him. Whether the writing and the plans originated in Haman's mind or not, is of no consequence. Suffice it that they bear the name and seal of the king. "But," says he, "you can obtain your wish very easily in another manner. Mordecai is now the keeper of the seals, and he can issue any decree in my name that he likes. It is now a well-known fact that Haman has fallen, that I gave to Esther the Jewess his house, and that he was hung because of his wanting to lay violent hands upon the Jews. Make this known everywhere! This will show all over the Persian kingdom what my will is, and where my interests lie. Then my governors and officials, after hearing these reports, will take care not to rise against the Jews. They will see from this that another party has come to the helm of government, and that it is not my will that the Jews should be wronged. As soon as the officials hear that the queen and the vizier are themselves of Jewish origin, they will instruct the people to behave themselves to the Jews in general with proper decorum, and not in the spirit of Haman. You can issue an edict in my name, which will virtually annul the first, but the first cannot be revoked. Write," says he, "now also to the Jews what you please," just as he had before left Haman to do what he liked. We observe in him the same arbitrary proceeding, the same carelessness as to the lives of many people, the same tyrannical caprice now for Esther as it was before for Haman,—all is easy in his hands, except to revoke his former edict, which might be regarded as derogatory to the royal dignity.

Vers. 9, 10. "Then were the king's scribes called at that time, in the third month, which is the month Sivan, on the three and twentieth day thereof," etc.

The name of the third month, Sivan, occurs for the first time here. Its meaning, like that of most names of the old calendar, has been entirely confused by Benfey and Stern in the book, Ueber die Monatsnamen. According to them, it is derived from an imaginary Iranian deity named Çpenta. The meaning can easily be seen. The second and the third month of the Jewish calendar were vernal months, whose names were transferable to each other, as is the case elsewhere. We frequently call June the second May. The month May, which is called in the later Jewish calendar יָרֵא, Iyar (εαρ, spring), goes in the Old Testament by the name of בָּנָן (1 Kings vi. 1, 37), meaning blossom, the month in which the trees are in bloom. Now, as the letters בָּנָן and בְּנָה are interchangeable (as in זָהָר and סָהָר), became בְּנֵי, to designate the second spring month, and the third in the year. The Lettes called it Seedu, month of blossoms (comp. my Sunem, 1876, p. 182).

The decree which Haman obtained with subtlety dated from the 13th of the first month Nisan, so that it was forty days in advance of this. It was therefore the more necessary to despatch the message without delay. For it had to be sent all over the empire to all nations, as everywhere a rising against the Jews was feared ; consequently we find here that not runners only were employed, as in the case of Haman's despatch, but also riders on swift steeds, mules, and young dromedaries. The expression רוכב הרכש is to show that besides riders on ordinary horses, סוסים, there were others who rode on race-horses. The word רכש is found in two other places in the O. T., in Micah i. 13 and 1 Kings v. 8, in conjunction with סוסים, and appears to be cognate with rachab, and to express "rash and fierce driving." That, therefore, the name of the famous horse of Rustem, Rekshh, is to be derived from רכש there can be no doubt, and not from its colour, as Vullers (Lex. Pers. ii. 24) asserts, for he himself gives it the general meaning of horse. It seems to me that this word gives us explicitly the origin of the German word Ross; Old High Germ., Old Low Germ. hros; Anglo-Sax. hors. This explanation was overlooked even by Grimm (Gesch. d. deutsch. Spr. p. 31). In the translation into the German language, the chs became an s or sch, as evidently is the case in the relation between the Hebrew רחש and the German rauschen. These runners are further designated on account of their excellence and swiftness as אֲחַשְׁתְּרָנִים. All recent commentators (as Bertheau, Keil, Schulz) have almost literally accepted the view of Haug, which is expressed in Ewald's Annual (v. 154), where he explained the word thus : "It is an adjective form of Kshatra, 'dominion,' 'the king,' with the termination ana, na, and signifies the ‘royal State horses.’” However specious this explanation may momentarily appear, it awakens doubt after close observation. First, because Haug himself explains in the previous page אַחֲשְׁרָפְנִים from Kshatra, “land,” “dominion,” and it did not occur to him that here in our text חַשְׁדָר is with a daleth, ד, while in אַחֲשְׁתְּרָנִים the same sound is given by a נ. Secondly, if it meant “royal,” it would have stood first in order by way of distinction. If it was not an official name, why did not the author use the Hebrew word מלך, which he frequently uses? If it were such, what does it mean? Were not the rest royal? Or were all royal horses sent? Why is this expression not used in connection with the State horse upon which Mordecai rode? Then, again, the formation of the word is defective. Kshatra means province, land (modern Pers. شهر). We do not observe the meaning of “stately,” “lordly,” in it. It would almost, on the contrary, express a contrast to what was royal, and rather express that which was provincial and belonged to a satrapy.

Now a closer observation will show that אַחֲשְׁתְּרָנִים is derived from the Old Persian שַׁתָּר with the prefixed syllable, and has the signification of dromedary. The camel, which is swift in running (“dromas velocissimi cursus,” Vullers, ii. 411), has this name (Zend. ushtra, uschtur, uchtur) Schutur, Schtur.¹ This name of the camel is manifestly, as dromedary, from δρομέω, “to run,” derived from the habit of the animal. The Tigris is therefore also called שַׁחַרְבָּ, because its current is swift. The word is doubtless connected with τρέχω (for στρέχω), and with the Zend. takshra, “to run” (Bournouf, Sur le Yaçna, p. 411). One is thereby reminded of the rapid running of a stream (comp. Dieffenbach, Goth. Glossen, ii. 316). The camel and the horse, on account of their swift running, have received various exchanges in name. In Old German glossaries the camel was called “wild horse.” The name for horse in the Middle Ages was warannio; Old High Germ. reinneo, reinno

(runner); warani, waranah, is used by Caucasian nations for camel (comp. my essay on the camel in Märk. Forschungen, vol. ix.). Accordingly, I translate אֲחַשְׁתָּרִינִים, “racers, horse-dromedaries,” for this is the sense of the narrative, that they ran swiftly, which was of greater importance than that they should be of stately appearance.

Old Jewish commentators have really understood camel by the word, and the swiftness of the camel is well known (see Ritter, xiii. 639 and 734). But in the posts which the Persian kings in the time of Xerxes used, it does not appear that camels were employed. In Mezahh Aaron (p. 48c) there is the curious remark that the sort of camel that was employed in the transmission of this message had eight feet, so that when four of them got tired it ran with the other four, and that the riders were tied to them, and had no garments nor saddles, and that these Ahhashtranim are called “trampeltrarius.” The Chaldean translators rendered the word by עֲרָטָלִי, “naked,” and the misunderstanding about the dromedary was added, because this loses its hair for some months, so that it appears as naked (comp. Oken’s Zusammenstellungen Naturgesch. vii. 1270, and Ritter, xiii. 654).

To the above explanation what follows is very suitable, בְּנֵי הַרְמָכִים, “sons of mares.” רַמְךָ is “stud,” Pers. ramakā (comp. Justi, Zum Bundeheesch, 158); but it was not new that all were bred of the stud; but in רַמְכָא, Syr. ramca, is repeated what Jacob Grimm (Deutsche Gram. iii. 327) remarks on the stud, that the word properly means, bred from the stud mares. רַמְכָא also is stud, and grex equarum, i.e. “bred as a stud” (Castelli, 867). They were mares particularly trained as racers. Probably what Xenophon says about the places in which the postmen with their attendants halted, in order to receive directions, has some reference to this (comp. Brisson, De reg. Persar. n. 338, p. 312).

The sending of the letter took place on the 23rd of the month Sivan. The date is just as purposely chosen as that of the first message by Haman. That was despatched on the 13th day of Nisan, which bore the name of Tir, “arrow,” among the Persians (see chap. iii. 12). Mordecai’s message was sent out on the 23rd day of the month Sivan, which corresponded to the Old Persian month also called Tir, which was the name among them for Mercurius the divine scribe (Hyde, De rel. Persar. p. 264), and the 23rd day had the name of Dai pa Din, on which day the Parsees pray for the expulsion of the evil of Satan. Besides this, Din had the signification of justice and law, and among the Jews יְמִינָה meant judgment; it was then, indeed, for Haman and his adherents a יְמִינָה, a day of judgment.

Vers. 11-14. “Wherein the king granted the Jews which were in every city to gather themselves together,” etc.

The edict of a Persian king was infallible and irrevocable; consequently another must be published to remove the mischievous effect of the former. In the first, direction was given to the party of Haman to destroy all the Jews; the second expresses that the king gives permission to the Jews to kill their enemies. The king could not order the enemies of the Jews to keep the peace, but could invest with authority those who were appointed by them for the slaughter. He did not literally take away the sword from the hands of the anti-Jewish party; but he at the same time handed it to the Jews. On the side on which the king lent his weight and authority victory was sure. Therefore the edict in favour of the Jews, according to the narrative, is verbally like the hostile edict against them, with the exception of a few variations which their peculiar position required. Because the Jews were scattered in different places, the decree provided that they should assemble themselves in localities and arm themselves so as to be able to offer a collected national opposition or assault. But they are authorized to exercise this power only against the חיל העם, “the fighting men,” of their enemies, but not against any one else. They may only fight against the party and adherents of Haman. They are the אויבם, “the enemies.” This was to take place on the same day which Haman had appointed for their destruction, on the 13th day of the month Adar. A day sooner would annul the former decree,—but the present was only another which supported the former. The month Adar (אדר) corresponds, according to its origin and meaning, with the month of March. The name already signified “fire” among the Chaldeans and Assyrians (Movers, Phænic. i. 340). Adramelech, a name containing the word Adar, was an idol to which children were offered up in burning fire. It represented the consuming and warming power of fire, as well as the warmth which the earth possesses and makes use of in the vernal season. Therefore March is also so called from Mars, not on account of its warlike, but on account of its agricultural significance. He was invoked that he should protect the field from injury; that he should give prosperity to the produce of the land, and to the cattle (comp. my Drachenkämpfe, p. 91). For Ares, whose power was transferred to Mars, means also nothing else but אָר = עַר, “fire” (comp. my Esmun, pp. 30, 31). He is the flaming god, and is represented on both sides of coins of Areopolis as holding weapons with burning torches. The genius of the modern Persian month Adar, although not corresponding now, as in olden times, with March (Hyde, De rel. Pers. p. 249), but with November, is yet connected with fire, the hearth, and the sun. The 9th of the month was illuminated by the festive fire, and all the altars were burning like funeral piles. According to Haman’s opinion, Israel should be consumed in flames of war; but instead of this they became a consuming fire for their enemies.

While in chap. iii. 15 it is merely said of the messengers of Haman that they went forth in haste, רְחוֹפִים, of these it is said, “they hastened and hurried on,” מְבָהֲלִים. The word דְחַפֵּן is only a transposition of פְחַד; “to be afraid,” “to flee,” “to hurry,” are cognate ideas (comp. חַפֵּן = חַפֵּן, which means the same when the consonants are thus exchanged). The same is the case with the verb בָּהֵל, “to be anxious,” “to flee,” “to tremble.” It contains the idea which is found in the Latin halitus, and expresses “panting for breath.” The messengers are breathlessly hurrying on, and anxious to carry out the king's command. The decree was published at Shushan, and only through this the inhabitants of the capital learned what had happened. Not only the fall of Haman, but also of his party, is but just now made known; but it is done in such a way as to produce a visible and forcible impression of a dramatic kind upon the great multitude.

Ver. 15. "And Mordecai went forth."

At the time (chap. iv. 1) when the dreadful decree against the Jews was issued, Mordecai rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth and ashes. Now, being placed by the king in Haman's position, he went out from the palace in official uniform. "He went forth," he let himself be seen, and by this the fall of Haman and the victory of his opponent was shown, so as to leave no doubt in any one's mind. He wore an apparel of blue and white. White and purple or violet were the Persian State colours. They have reference to the Persian religious view about the world. White is the colour of light, blue of the sky, purple of the sun. He wore on his head "a great crown of gold," גְּדוֹלָה וְבָעֵתָרָה. When the king asked Haman, on that eventful night, what he should do to the man whom he wanted to honour, he replied, he should put upon his head the כַּחֲרֵת מֶלֶכְתָּה, "the cidaris, which the king alone could wear," the straight one (ὅρθη). It is not said that he conferred this honour upon Mordecai. He only granted him royal dress and a royal horse. And now is עַטְרָה to be distinguished from כַּחֲרֵת; the first is a diadem twisted round about the head. Verbally עַטְרָה and tiara (in Herod. τιάρας or τιήρης) seem to be the same (Hyde, De rel. Pers. p. 369); but, in fact, it is more used and described as a cidaris, and is really only a diadem, and therefore must mean such in our passage, for only such was made of gold. With regard to the identity of the tiara with the cidaris, Spanheim says (Dissert. de usu et præst. Nummor. p. 770): "Conjuncta itaque in regione Persarum aut Armeniorum etiam culta illa capitis ornamenta tiara ac diadema non vero ut eadem, sed diversa.”¹ In themselves tiara and cidaris were not the same; but they were bound together, for the former was wound around the latter, and appears also on the coins of the Arsacides without the cidaris (comp. Vaillant, Regnum Arsacidarum, p. 1, etc.). So the name tiara came to be used for the whole ornamentation of the head, and appeared to signify כתר, a crown, while it was only an עטרה or טטרה. Mordecai did not wear a high hat, which the king alone could wear, but a princely tiara, which was big enough, and embroidered with gold. A passage in Strabo (lib. xv. c. iii. 19, ed. Paris, p. 625) clearly describes his uniform: “They, the princes, have a lined robe with sleeves down to the knees (χιτιόν), inside it is (ρω) white, outside it is ἀνθιώσ,—better to read ἵανθιώσ, viz. violet blue (חכלת); in the summer they wear a mantle of purple, but in winter it is of a variegated colour or blue (just according to the reading ἀνθιών or ἵανθιών).”

Mordecai was so dressed, and as it was summer, in the month of Sivan, he wore a purple mantle. The name תכרייך, which occurs only here to denote the stately flowing robe, is very frequently used by the Jews to signify a wrapping up in general (as the case is with instrumentum), and specially for the grave-cloth or shroud in which the dead are buried. The second Targum renders it by גלימה, which Buxtorf and Levy after him consider Hebrew (Lex. Chald. p. 143); but in 2 Kings ii. 8, it is a wrapping together of the mantle, which appears as contrary to enveloping. The etymological explanation in the Talmud, Tr. Shabbath, p. 77b, that one appears in such a mantle like a נלם,² “a puppet,” shows that the meaning was then obscure. It is nothing else but the Greek καλύμμα.

The Midrash Esther, ed. Amst. p. 95a, speaks of coins on which the images of Mordecai and Esther were struck on each side. If such really existed, they must have been issued for political reasons in later times. It is quite probable, as we have instances of Oriental coins which represent a man on one side and a woman on the other, as Zenobia and her son, or Aurelian. But there can be no thought of authenticating the report of the Midrash, as Hottinger is inclined to do (Cippi, Hebr. p. 147).

² [Rashi, in loc., explains that it means a garment made of one piece of cloth, without being cut for sleeves, etc.—TRANS.]

"And Mordecai went forth." וְיָצַא.

This expression is reproduced by John in chap. xix. 5, when he says: Ἐξῆλθεν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, "Jesus therefore came out" from the palace of Pilate, as Mordecai from the palace of the Persian king. Mordecai with the golden crown and stately robe, and Jesus wearing the crown of thorns and also a purple garment; Mordecai triumphant, but Jesus mocked and scourged. Mordecai went out to avenge his people by imbruining his hands in the blood of their enemies; but Jesus went out to pour out His life-blood on the cross, in order to redeem all from eternal death. It is impossible that John should not have had this passage in mind, and it is strange that modern commentators of the N. T. have not referred to it.

Ver. 16. "The Jews had light." אורָה.

Light is salvation, redemption, happiness,—the preceding anxiety had been to them like night. The morning emancipates, spring redeems, and good news brings light and liberty. The placing of lights,¹ together with the expressions of gladness and joy and honour, is certainly peculiar to the book of Esther; and this is to be attributed to the influence of the view which the Persians took of the universe, according to which light was the present agency in everything good. Ahuramazda—אֹרְמָזְדָה—was the antithesis of everything defiled and impure, and of all deceit and slander (comp. Hyde, pp. 161, 162).—שְׁנִיא, gladness, is radically and essentially like the

Ver. 17. "And many from among the people of the land became Jews."

Our text has the word מתחדדים.¹ And from this it was inferred from very ancient times (even by the Targumim) that there must be a verb יחד, from יהוד, to signify "the act of making a proselyte to Judaism." But the word does nowhere occur. Neither biblical nor post-biblical Hebrew knows it, but rather for the said act the words ניר and מתניר do everywhere occur. I cannot believe that the narrative meant to convey the idea that "many became Jews," that they cut themselves off from their national connection, and embraced the Mosaic religion by circumcision, etc. This would not have been recorded in one short sentence forming only half of a verse in the original. Such an event would have excited a great deal of comment and much material for the historian. The removal of the wall of partition which separated the Persians from the Jews by their respective rites and customs, would have produced such a change among them both, that the fact would not have been passed over so slightly as if it was of no great importance. What the passage means in all probability is this—that many Persians made common cause with the Jews, that they became friendly to them, and united with them in hostility against the party of Haman, as they saw that the Jews had such high influence at court, and that their patron was a great favourite of the king. I think, therefore, that we are to read מתחדדים, from יחד, "to unite," which word occurs frequently in this sense in the O. T., in the Targum, and in the Talmud.

¹ [Although the LXX. and the Syriac read as the Masoretic text, yet it may be that the scribes had afterwards purposely exchanged the פ for a ה, as some codices have even a circle to indicate that a ה is wanting. Haub says: "None sine causâ circulum habent codices. Nam legendum מתחזרדים, inserta ה, quia תול non abest ab יהודים Judaeis." The author's view gains support from the comment of Ibn Ezra, who makes a compromise by saying, that they only assumed the name of Jew.—TRANS.]

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1. “Now in the twelfth month.”

The arrow which Haman was to throw on the 13th of Adar upon the people of Israel fell upon his own head, and upon the heads of his family and party. That day was to be the great day of battle against the Jews, and his own sons fell. He that digs a pit for others falls into it himself. What he wanted to do to others was accomplished in himself. As Adonibezek said, “As I have done, so God hath requited me” (Judg. i. 7; see my Comm. p. 7); so it was fulfilled on the 13th of Adar. In the book of Wisdom (chap. xi. 15, 16) we read, “But for the foolish devices of their wickedness, wherewith being deceived they worshipped serpents void of reason . . . thou didst send a multitude of unreasoning beasts upon them for vengeance: That they might know, that wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished.” The history of the artist Perillus, who had made a bull of copper for Phalaris of Agrigentum, in order to torture those whom he murdered, and was the first to suffer by it himself, is repeated in all legendary collections. The German imperial chronicle tells a similar instructive story of the Emperor Nerva, to whom an artist offered to manufacture a horse of a wonderful kind. It was so constructed, that if a knight should be placed upon it, the horse would fly in the air and the knight would be burned. Nerva tried this first on the artist himself (see Massmann, Kaiserchronik, iii. 747). It is not clear why the legend was transferred to Nerva. Probably he is confounded with Nero. But it is a matter of history that Louis XI., king of France, put Bishop Roland of Verdun in the iron cage which he had invented.—Comines reports, “Fecerat caveas ferreas ligneasque ferreas laminis intra extraque inductas cum terribilibus claustris, octo pedum amplitudine, unum altitudine supra staturam hominis. Primus harum auctor Episcopus Verdunensis fuit, qui in primam earundem ut primum facta fuit missus quatuordecim annos habitavit" (Rer. Gest. Ludov. XI., lib. vi. c. xii.). Similarly it is told of Ezzelin, who made the architect the first prisoner in the prison which he had erected (Massmann, i. 1, quoted from Muratori). Massmann has also overlooked a similar story of an artificial horse of which Plutarch tells in connection with Aemilius Censorinus in Egesta. This man was a cruel governor, and a certain Aruntius Paterculus offered to make him a horse of metal by which he might torture people. Then the tyrant tested its efficacy upon the artist (Plut. Comparison of Greek and Roman Reports, n. 39). The modern history of France shows a remarkable retribution in name and in date. Louis XIV. ordered on October 12, 1693, to demolish the royal tombs at Spire. The man who was entrusted with the superintendence of the work was called Hentz. On October 12, 1793, the revolution began by the demolishing of the royal tombs at St. Denis, and the French representative who undertook it had also the name of Hentz. When the narrator in the book of Esther rightly points to the retaliation which the tyranny of Haman received, the Jews should not forget that they experienced a similar retribution in their history. They shouted triumphantly when Jesus was crucified. And so the whole Roman army shouted triumphantly when Vespasian and Titus returned as victors to Rome and there publicly crucified Simon Giora. There were not trees enough at the siege of Jerusalem on which to crucify all the prisoners of war. I have referred to these wonderful retrIBUTions in my small book, Israel in der Weltgeschichte.

Ver. 2. "For the fear of them was fallen upon all the peoples."

If the second edict had not come, Haman's party would naturally have obtained the ascendancy. In such a despotic country everything depended upon the knowledge which people had of what was precisely the king's will and caprice. When the people heard that Haman's party were in bad odour at court, that their leader was killed, and that Mordecai was in his place, and was ever gaining in influence, their intention and desire of laying violent hands on the Jews was relinquished. True, the first edict was still valid according to the letter; but the second showed that the party to be attacked had now the upper hand, and although the first was not revoked, it would be decidedly against the will of the king to molest them. All the officials, from the satrap downwards, had no other will but that which was in harmony with the royal will (under עשי המלְאכָה are to understood those who used to do the king's will).¹ Consequently they were now just as disposed not to put any obstacle before the Jews, as they were before to assume a hostile attitude against them. Courtiers and officials are double-faced, according as they receive sunshine or cloud from above, i.e. from the court. The law is therefore to them only a bugbear; it frequently changes its appearance; now it is a roaring lion, and now a mouse, and so on. What will the satraps and pashas, whose positions are entirely dependent upon the favour of the king, what will they undertake against the Jews when they hear that one of them is the favourite prime minister of the king?

A linguistic peculiarity is to be observed in the word הגע, by way of analogous expressions in other languages. גע means "to touch," and in the causative form גע, "touch in point of time," "to arrive," and is used in ver. 26 in the same way as the Germans say Zustossen, Eintreffen; R. V. had "come" (reached) "unto them." Comp. chap. iv. 3, where גע ought to be translated "reached." Not in the same manner do accidere, συμβαίνειν, evenire, etc., agree, but ἰκνέομαι is doubtless from the same root as גע, as well as of the same meaning.

נהפוך is, of course, an infin. absol. It is used in the sense of reverting, turning over, upside down. The obscure etymology of הפק becomes clear by a comparison with the Latin vix, vice, German Wechsel, English "turn." שלט, "to rule," doubtless reappears in the German Schalten, and in Sultan having the sense of ruling powerfully.

Ver. 4. האיש מרדכי—“The man Mordecai.”

This האיש is of special significance when it is joined to a proper name. It represents the person as distinguished, as a man of influence and name.—So in Num. xii. 3, the word man is applied to Moses by way of emphasis, that such a man as Moses was very meek above all. Of the false Micah it is said: “And there was a man of the hill country of Ephraim whose name was Micah,” and he had his own house of worship, Judg. xvii. 1.

Of Jeroboam it is said, “And the man Jeroboam was a mighty man,” 1 Kings xi. 28.

Especially significant is Dan. ix. 21: “And the man Gabriel.” So it is used here.

Mordecai had a name, position, importance, and influence, and was continually advancing.

Ver. 5. “And the Jews smote.”

The narrator lays stress upon the fact that the Jews were mowing down their enemies with great fury, and that they were not interfered with by the authorities of the land. Such party warfares in the Persian kingdom are quite authentic. The narrator characterizes their violence on the opponents as inflicting death and destruction. They not merely humiliated them, or put them to flight, but they exterminated them. The authorities were silent spectators, and did not come to the assistance of the defeated party. That is what is meant by the word בְּרִצּוֹנָם, “they did according to their good pleasure,” without let or hindrance. The Persian authorities saw their countrymen and co-religionists in the hands of the Jews ; but they feared the king—and he was more than God—more than love—he had given his consent, and therefore the victims must fall.

It was a battle between inhabitants of the same country, but they were not fellow-citizens. They were all fellow-servants under one master. Only the Jews had a God in heaven, but they did not imitate His reconciliation and love.

The names of the ten sons of Haman give occasion for interesting remarks. Very little has as yet been done for their interpretation. The explanations of Jules Oppert (Extrait des Annales de philosophie Chrétienne, Janvier 1864, p. 22) are mere guesswork, paying more attention to the sound than to the ideas contained in them. All the names are pervaded by religious ideas in connection with the fire-worship ; they originated in the religion of the Magi, and their formation and composition bear that character. But the text does not give them in their purity ; one feels that they have been tortured by the hands of the conquerors. As their houses have been sacked, so were their names deformed and caricatured. The popular custom to extend the strife so as to assail the honour and name of the aggressive or opposing party took place also here. I have shown elsewhere¹ how old the custom is, and that this is not the only place in which it appears in the Old Testament. The hostility of the two parties in the Persian kingdom went so far, that they trampled the names in the dust, and they revealed their wrath in caricatures upon them. If we prove this in the case of a few names, we shall have the probability that it was so with all. The last son of Haman is called אַשְׁרָה.²

The name evidently signifies son of fire, for אֵשׁ means fire, and אֶנְתָּה, natus, “son” (comp. Justi, Zum Bundesgesetz, p. 164). It was written אַ, which means “woe” (see chap. i. 1), and this woe was indicated by making the letter וּ large, and the וּ smaller than usual, for the same reason. The second name is דָלְפָן. Even at present the Jews nickname a poor man by Dalphon, because דָלּ means poor, miserable, wretched. This Persian name was properly Durpan, דָרְבָּאָן, meaning "a guard of the temple." In the same manner they have in some names omitted the letter d in data, in order to get a secondary meaning. They call one Purta instead of Purdata, in order to obtain the meaning that he was one upon whom the pur, the lot, fell by the direction of God,—and because Purta is in Aramaic "little," "dirt," "distress," and "shame." They write אַסְפָּתָא instead of אַסְפָּדָה. The proper meaning of the name was (sun) horse-given (comp. aspban, Justi, 63); they make of it asafta in reference to the Aramaic word אַסְפָּוִי, meaning "a foundling." The first name is פְּרַשְׁנֹדָהָא. The Masoretes have written the ח at the end small, in order to make it appear like פְּרַשְׁנָדָא, for פְּרַשְׁנָדָא again means "dirt," and נְדָא means "bespattering," or if thus written נְדָה, it means "uncleanness." In itself, it is either one born of a high-caste family, a פְּרַשְׁאָן = פְּרַזְׁאָן, persona, parson, person; or it comes from bursin, fire (Hyde, De rel. Pers. 362). Yet Vullers gives the last as meaning "a fire-worshipping priest" (Lex. i. 219). In the name פְּרַמְשָׁהָא, also, the שׁ was written small in order to pervert the sense. It evidently means one born of Behram (Behram = Mars, Atesh-Behram, πῦρ ἄρειον; comp. Hyde, p. 533). They want to connect it with פְּרִימָה, "rending asunder," in a degraded sense. The names אֲרִידָהָא (not אֲרִידָה, as in some editions), אֲרִידֵי¹, אֲרִיסֵי, Oppert brings together with Ariyadata, Ariyaçaya, Ariyadaya, but I would rather consider them as compounds of אָוָר, fire. The Jews wanted to understand by אֲרִידָהָא, "an offspring of a lion;" and by אֲרִיסֵי, "poison." In אֲרִידֵי, I am not sure whether the last syllable was to point to דֵי, "pain," "sickness," "trouble." Adalia was probably originally Adaria, derived from אָדָר, "fire." It is clear that they made an effort to heap upon the fireworshippers scornful epithets. This was not merely because they were victorious over their enemies, but chiefly because their hateful religion had received a blow. That the Jews cared more for retaliating and avenging than for enriching themselves, appears from the added clause: "but on the spoil they laid not their hand." בָּזֶבֶל, "spoil," from בָּזַל, "to take spoil." So is ἀρπαγμα, from ἀρπάξω. To בָּזָה, without doubt, belongs the German word Beute (English "booty," "butin"), as יְהִי is frequently assimilated with יְהִי and בָּזָה.

Ver. 11. "On that day."

The news of the day was, of course, reported to the king from every quarter of Shushan. He communicated it to Esther with an air of the greatest indifference, as if he asked her how she likes the handsome present he had given her. He asks her caressingly: "Have I not done it well? 500 have been slain in Shushan, Haman's sons are dead; and if this has happened here, what must have taken place in the provinces?" He at any rate expected, as it seems, that Esther would express her satisfaction. But the grand woman has caught the spirit of a Persian queen. It was not for nothing that she ascended the throne. She wants to use the favourable moment, and to carry on the war thoroughly to the end. She fears the vengeance of some of the hostile party who had not yet been vanquished. If these are not put down with a strong hand, she is afraid that they will eventually retaliate, —and how easy it is to change the mind of a Persian king, she knows well from her own experience. He tells her that 500 have been slain in the citadel of Shushan—viz. on the 13th of the month. She asks him to issue an especial decree (מְרֵא) to continue the battle on the next day in the city itself. There is evidently a distinction between what took place in the two days. The former decree was only valid for the 13th, and therefore a new one was necessary if the war was to be continued. The partisans of Haman were killed in the citadel, but not in the city. - Hence Esther's petition.

She is not satisfied with the slaughter of Haman's sons. They must also be hung up, as Haman was, on the gallows. The people should see the destruction of the whole household. They should be impressed with the fact that all the leaders of the party met the same disgraceful end as their chief. This she considers necessary, not only for accentuating her triumph, but that it might have a deterring effect. They should have a visible demonstration of the end of the enemies of Israel. Esther must not be judged by the standard of the love of Christ. She and her people were engaged in a battle against a powerful party, at whose head was the king himself, and she would have succumbed, had she not, in a wonderful manner, won him over to her side, and enlisted his participation. But that there is a difference between the mode of warfare of the Jews and that of their enemies, is seen from this, that had they been defeated, all their property would have been made booty (chap. iii. 13), while they do not touch the property of their enemies.

That the ten sons of Haman were hung on the same gallows as Haman, is not expressly stated in the text. The Jewish commentators take the word רַקְנָה for the same tree that was used at the hanging of Haman. The manner in which the names of the ten sons of Haman are placed in Jewish manuscripts and books, viz. in a straight column one under the other, is owing to a Midrash. In fact, the later Jews show more hatred against Haman and his family than even his contemporaries did who were engaged in the strife, for it is directed against those who had long ago been judged. Yet this hatred is expressive of later experiences. They narrate that the ten sons of Haman were so hung under each other upon the gallows of fifty cubits, that each took up the space of three cubits, leaving the space of one cubit between one another, so that all the ten occupied forty cubits. The remaining ten cubits on the top was occupied by the body of Haman. Thus he crowned the summit of the gallows. The picture of the gallows is indicated by the large ; of the last name. They also tell of a mocking conversation which Mordecai carried on with Haman when he was on the gallows, and Haman's thoughts. (It certainly reminds us of the scorn with which they treated Christ on the cross.) They said jestingly, As Haman was one with his sons during life, so they must be united in their death. Even at the present time they read the ten names in the synagogue in one breath, in order to intimate that they were all made to expire at one and the same time, as a punishment for their wanting to destroy Israel in one day. So it was that the battle lasted two days in Shushan, while in the other parts of the Persian kingdom it was confined to the 13th day, in accordance with the letter of the law. On the 14th quiet was to be restored. The number of the slain, 75,000, sounds dreadful; but when 810 fell in the capital alone, the number is proportionally not so large when divided between the various places of the kingdom. Human life was very cheap in the eyes of a Persian tyrant. 75,000 men fell in a battle, whose only origin was in the circumstance that a decree issued by the king was irrevocable.

Ver. 17. "And made it a day of feasting and gladness."

The historical celebration of the feast of Purim is treated elsewhere.—We have here an unvarnished picture of the life of the ancient world,—how the people, after the trouble they had gone through, rejoice and express their joy by eating and drinking, just as they before express their sorrow by fasting. Above, in the narrative of the fast, God is not mentioned before whom they expressed their sorrow in heartfelt repentance; nor is God mentioned now, that they expressed their gratitude to Him in the feast of rejoicing. Yet there is no meal and no feast among the Jews without reference to God and mention of His name. But there is a marked difference between the people in captivity and the people which Moses brought out of Egypt. The ancient Jews used to say, that Haman was in his time the same to the Jews that Pharaoh was to that generation. They also made it a rule that on a leap year the feast of Purim should be kept on the 14th of the second Adar, which in an ordinary year would be the feast of Passover. But there is a great difference between the solemnity with which the Passover was observed and the giddy joy of Purim. In the first, the unleavened bread, the Passover lamb, the blood, the feast itself, reminded them of sin, repentance, reconciliation, and redemption, while in Purim only the voice of exultation was and is heard. Passover is therefore in the highest sense the feast in which confession is made. Purim represents more the character of a national holiday. Therefore also the Church of Christ gave great glory to the feast of the Passover, while of Purim she took no notice, as it had vanished even from the circle of the early Jewish Christians.

Therefore the Lord's Supper is and should be the fairest of all feasts. Nowhere else can or dare one better express his gratitude and his joy for redemption and salvation.

Ver. 19. “The Jews of the villages that dwell in unwalled towns.”

Hitherto and the פְּרוֹזִים were taken as people and cities of the flat or open country, in contrast to Shushan. But the idea that these words are intended to convey is more precise. The narrator distinguishes three kinds of Jews. First, the Jews in Shushan; secondly, ver. 16, the Jews that were in the provinces, הַיּוֹדִים אֲשֶׁר בָּמְדִינֹת. The contrast to Shushan is the Medina. Thirdly, the Jews who were reported הַפְּרוֹזִים. If these were the same as those in the provinces, then they would be mentioned successively twice, for it is already said in ver. 17, that on “the 14th day they rested, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.” Moreover, the word Perazim would have occurred in ver. 17. The word therefore, כֵּן, also shows that the Jews spoken of are others, who lived neither in Shushan nor in the Medinoth.

Undoubtedly ערי פְּרוֹזָה are unfortified towns and places in the east country, in Turkestan and Turan, on whose extensive prairies many Jews were scattered. These words are clearly illustrated by Ezek. xxxviii. 11, where ערי פְּרוֹזָה are clearly described by אַרְצֵי פְּרוֹזָה. He represents there a land having cities without walls. The word פְּרוֹ seems to be related to the Greek πόρος, “a ford.”

“And of sending portions.”

The portion or present מנה, both as a noun and a verb, is the Greek νέμω, with the transposition of m and n. (Probably originally μείρωμαι, μείρω, belonged also to it, and their relation to each is like that between donum and δῶρον.) The opinion, which is also shared by Fürst, that Mammon (μαμμᾶνα) is a doubling of מנה, is erroneous. The expression Mammon is formed of nummus.

Ver. 20. “And Mordecai wrote.”

This is a very remarkable fact. It was quite natural for the Jews, after receiving the tidings that the king was favourably disposed toward them, and that they had gained the victory over their enemies, to express their joy by keeping a feast. But that this feast should be instituted for all times was nevertheless singular, inasmuch as Mordecai possessed no spiritual authority to order such a perpetual institution. The importance that he possessed, he only gained through the influence of Esther. And now he did not occupy the place of a synod of the elders, nor of a high priest, but the place of the grand vizier at the Persian court. It was this position which gave him the authority of ordaining a perpetual feast for the Jews. He considered the King of Persia as the king of the Jews, and as his representative he possessed Jewish-national authority. For, indeed, it was only to be a national feast, only a feast in remembrance of the victory over their enemies. The letters of Mordecai do not prescribe any prayers to be used on the feast, but only the making of merriment. There is no reference to any passage of Scripture in them, but only a reminder of the present wonderful deliverance. Of course, by the remembrance of the dangers they had gone through, he wants to strengthen and to encourage the hearts of the Jews, but the authority by which he commands is solely his own. Hitherto no feasts were kept by them save those commanded by Moses in the name and by the authority of God. It was to a certain extent a feast of the exile, in which also the exiled men became the means of deliverance. Mordecai, too, directs his writings only to the Jews in the empire of King Ahhashverosh, "both nigh and far."

It is to be observed that the ground here given for enjoining the feast is not because the Jews had obtained predominance, but the sudden change in their condition from trouble to tranquillity, from sorrow to gladness. On such occasions they sent to each other presents, according to the custom of the times;—but Mordecai was particularly anxious in his letters that they should bestow gifts upon the poor. It does not appear that Mordecai was conscious, when instituting this feast, that he could not enjoin it in the spirit and authority of Moses. True, it is added, "and the Jews took upon them" (וְקִבַּח), they declared their readiness to comply with his order, which was easy enough, for people are generally glad to have an annual festival of rejoicing, especially under such circumstances; but there was yet wanting in it any previous consultation with the people as to whether they wanted to have such a feast for all time. It was the same Mordecai that ordained it who had procured for them the second decree of the king.

Ver. 23. From the words, "and as Mordecai had written," the editor of the book begins to write his appendix. Thus far he has given the original narrative. Now the style is quite different. He uses quite different forms of expressions. The phrase אמֵר עַמּוֹ הַסְּפָר, "he commanded by a writing," ver. 25, is only found here. The same idea is expressed above only by נָתַן דָת, “he gave an order.” Again, when we read in ver. 24, “Haman devised to destroy them,” he uses the מְשֻׁבֶּב, which was not used above, and only because it is of similar sound with מְצֻהָה. Further, when we read, ver. 26, they called these days Purim; with regard to the events of this day, אֹנוֹת, “letter,” we must understand by the “letter” the whole book of Esther, which was sent with a memorandum to the Jews. The word does not occur above. Finally, when it said (ver. 27), “the Jews took upon them, and upon their seed, and upon all such as joined themselves unto them (בְּלִילָהָם),” one understands by this word, which does not occur in the real text, and especially from the same word in Dan. xi. 34, that it refers to false associates. It appears that it is applied not so much to such as were completely converted to the Jewish faith, as to such as had become friends and helpers. The reason why they should also at all times keep the feast, is because they must reflect that in case the party of Haman had gained the victory, they as friends and confederates of the Jews would have perished with them. They were those of whom mention is made in chap. viii. 17; and my hypothesis, that we are there to read מִתְחִדִים, “they united themselves,” is thereby confirmed. Were it not so, we should not have הַנְלִים, but גְּרִים, “proselytes,” or a similar word.

Ver. 28. “And that these days.”

The Jewish commentators conclude from these words that the book of Esther was written by inspiration, because it is here said, “these days should be remembered, and should not fail from the Jews,” which must be a prophecy.

They have indeed been fulfilled, for the feast of Purim has never been forgotten by the Jews; nevertheless, they were not spoken in prophetic language, but in legislative language. These days of Purim shall not fail from among the Jews, nor the memorial of them perish from their seed.¹

¹ [Jewish tradition teaches that in the days of Messiah all the feasts shall cease except the feast of Purim.—TRANS.]

Ver. 29. "Then Esther the queen, the daughter of Abihail, wrote."

This second letter proves more decisively that Esther and Mordecai assumed a special authority over the Jews, at least in so far as they were connected with the related events. The addition here of the words "daughter of Abihail" is borrowed from the solemn introductory sentence of her own letter. But the object of the second letter was not merely to emphasize and to confirm the first. The emphasis consists chiefly in this, that Esther added her authority to that of Mordecai. Therefore she inserts the words בְּכָל תִּקְרָפָה, "with all strength or authority." The last expression occurs only once more in Daniel, and means "the royal authority," "the influence," "the order," of the shah. For the celebration of the feast of Purim, the royal authority of Esther was made use of. Therefore the first word of ver. 29 has in the text a large ת, thus וּתְנַתֵּהוּ, to emphasize that the queen herself wrote the letter with her own hand. This letter was sent like a royal decree to the Jews in all the 127 provinces, and contained only words of peace and of assurance. It was comforting news which Mordecai could communicate in the name of Esther. The more so—and this was the second reason for the letter—because the Jews, in consideration of what had happened, are requested not only to keep the feast with gladness, but also the previous fast, remembering that Mordecai and Esther have themselves fasted during the distress. They had in the hour of danger cried to God and totally abstained from food. This also should never vanish from the memory of the Jews.

After the despatch of the first letter of Mordecai, it became then a serious question whether it was possible to establish on his sole authority a feast like the Mosaic ones; therefore the influence of Esther was invoked—and should it be only a feast of joy! If they had passed from sorrow to joy (מִנּוֹן לִשְׁמָחָה), they should not only commemorate the experienced joy, but also the sorrow.

The duty was enforced upon the Jews to imitate everywhere, and at all times, the example of Esther and Mordecai, and to devote one day in the year to fasting and prayer. For this the authority of Mordecai alone was not sufficient. Therefore it is written (ver. 32), "the commandment of Esther confirmed these matters of Purim," and the fast is indeed called the fast of Esther, the day before Purim. But that this day was originally the 13th of Adar is not expressly stated, but it may be supposed so, as the 13th day was the day of distress. It must not be overlooked in confirmation of this, that in ver. 31, Mordecai is mentioned before Esther, because Mordecai began the fast (iv. 1). We have the word וְאַתָּה here, as in iv. 16, of Esther, and וְאַתָּה, as in iv. 1, of Mordecai, בְּרִירָה, "and he cried with a loud and a bitter cry."

The book properly ends with chap. ix. All is written in the book, the event, the help, and the feast. The contents of chap. x. are only a historical postscript.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1. "And the king Ahhashverosh laid a tribute upon the land."

Short as the sentence is, it has yet caused a good deal of speculation. It was sought in various ways to explain why the narrator made this record. Jewish commentators wanted to assume that the king had put all under tribute except the Jews, which is by no means intimated. Grotius was of opinion that this is stated in order to enhance the merits of Mordecai. He exclaims : "Sunt enim Judaei, magni artifices talium."

More modern commentators, as Bertheau and Schulz, said the author wished to show the power of the king. Keil, as well as others, thought that he only communicated an item from the Persian annals.

The report must show the bias of the narrator; it contributes to magnify the wonderful change which the deliverance of Israel had brought about. The king had given up much when he had prevented the destruction of Israel. It was not alone that he had renounced the offer of Haman, but also the whole property of the Jews, which, if they had been cut off, would have become his own in all places of his dominion. All this was taken from him. The product of the plunder was so much loss for him. With this thought the narrator connects the report concerning the tribute. Instead of taking away the property of the Jews, he laid a tribute upon all. The whole kingdom must make up the deficiency which arose from his presenting the Jews with their own riches.

This application of the general historical fact agrees with the spirit of the whole narrative. In the texts in this verse we find mostly אהשרש, while in the other passages it is written אהשוש. This is scarcely a mistake of the scribe, but is intentional. The two ו in the name Ahhashverosh express the woe which the deed of Ahhashverosh occasioned. I go so far as to believe that the reading in this verse is the proper one, and the other a homiletic corruption, although in the last mention of the name it is pointed as in the first. In chap. v. 2 we have an imitation of the style of the book of Kings. פְּרָשָׁה, as was observed in iv. 7, is used in the sense of "the full sum;" so here it means "the distinguished," "the highest," influence of Mordecai. It is surprising that Mordecai bears no other title but Yehudi, "the Jew." But at that time it was only a national and religious epithet. It had not yet received the sarcastic and annoying character which was put upon it in later centuries. He calls Mordecai מלך משנה, literally, "the second to the king." By which is meant the king's grand vizier, his substitute, who was the keeper of the royal seal. That it was a general Oriental dignity may be inferred from 2 Chron. xxviii. 7, where it is told that Zichri slew Elkanah the מלך. It seems to have appeared strange to the narrator that Mordecai, although a captive Jew, should have become royal vizier. He was, says he, גָּדוֹל לִיהוּדִים, "great among the Jews." Just as the king of Persia and the king of Assyria were both called מלך הגדול, "the great king," that is, the one who had power over the others, so this expression is used with regard to Mordecai, he was a great one for the Jews, viz. their representative and their prince of the captivity, as he proved by his letters.—And, indeed, he was not like one of the many ministers who as Jews held offices in Muhamedan or Christian courts, for he had more power than they, and was elevated for quite different reasons. The others, not even excepting R. Chisdai in Cordova, were raised to their ministerial offices on account of their knowledge of finance; but not one of them, however highly esteemed and appreciated, "was great among the Jews" in the sense in which Mordecai was. He was the acknowledged saviour of the life of his king and of the lives of the Jews. His only great prototype was Joseph, for Daniel, as it seems, possessed only spiritual authority in Babylon.

And the power that Mordecai possessed over the Jews was popular and pleasing, "accepted (רֹצֶחֶת) of the multitude." He did not oppress them; they, his brethren (רָחָבָה); he did not assume a proud and overbearing air towards them, and did not forget in the uniform of the grand vizier the garment of the penitent. Why should he not be beloved by them when he had promoted their safety and welfare, and made arrangements that his posterity should maintain the peace? For this is the sense of דָוְבֵר שָׁלוֹם, "speaking peace." They were not merely words of peace, but he laboured that the peace should remain uninterrupted for the present and the future, that is, for "his seed" (גַּעֲנָה), viz. "the posterity of the people," inasmuch as their enemies had received a mortal blow.

Alas! the book closes without further information about the end of the king, of Esther, and of Mordecai. But no other disturbance occurred, and, in fact, the Jews enjoyed prosperity and peace in the Persian kingdom beyond the time of Alexander the Great. But we have no more information about such persons as Mordecai and Esther. Later times have given us many speculative interpretations, but not facts of authentic historical value.

THE SECOND TARGUM.

(Translated from the Aramaic.)

§ I.

AND it came to pass in the days of Ahhashverosh, one of the ten kings¹ who once ruled and are to rule the world in the future. And these are the ten kings. The first kingdom is that of the King of kings, the Lord of hosts,—may it be speedily magnified upon us. The second is that of Nimrod, the third of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, the fourth of Israel, the fifth of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, the sixth of Ahhashverosh, the seventh of Greece, the eighth of Rome, the ninth of the King Messiah, the son of David, the tenth (again) of the King of kings, the Lord of hosts,—may it be speedily revealed to us, and to all the inhabitants of the earth.² When the kingdom of Babylon was about to be destroyed from the earth, and its dominion to pass away from it, the inhabitants of the country did not know whom they should place as king

¹ In Dan. vii. 24, Rev. xvii. 12, we have parallel passages in which the rulers of the world are spoken of as ten in number. The idea of such universal rulers is more peculiar to the East, where the great shahs have always pretended to be rulers of the world. Of Kai Kawus says Firdussi, among other things,—

“Now Kawus as king in the place of his father succeeded,
And all the world was to him subjected.
Now he saw that the earth quaked and trembled.”

This idea is more largely developed in a mythic-dogmatic way in the “Tshakravartins” of the Buddhists. Tshakravartin was lord of the wheel, i.e. of the world. Universal kings were the lords of the ages. It must be so understood if one of these Tshakravartins appears to be lord of the iron wheel, another of that of brass, another of that of silver, and another of that of gold (Remusat on Foe-koue-ki, Paris 1836, p. 134). Buddha had the choice, according to the legend, of becoming either a Tshakravartin or an ascetic. He chose the last (comp. Matt. iv. 8).

over them. And when Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, died, Evil-Merodach succeeded him, and the inhabitants of the country did not want to raise him over them. For they answered and said to him, "Thy father Nebuchadnezzar had not his dwelling with men, and how shall we place thee over us? Thy father Nebuchadnezzar may perhaps of a sudden turn up, and come upon us and kill us." When Evil-Merodach heard these words of the people of his country, he said to them, "My father Nebuchadnezzar is surely dead and is removed from the world, and yet until now you do not believe it." They rejoined, "Nebuchadnezzar thy father made the whole earth tremble, and all the kingdoms thereof; for concerning him it is expressly written: 'Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms ?'" (Isa. xiv. 16). What did Evil-Merodach do at that time? He went to the treasuries of the king, and brought out from these chains of iron and of brass, and threw them upon the soles of Nebuchadnezzar his father,¹ and dragged him out of his grave. As it is written concerning him: "But thou art cast forth away from thy sepulchre like an abominable branch" (ibid.). And when the people saw that Evil-Merodach had done the will of his heavenly Father, they all rose up with great rejoicing, and they clothed him with the beautiful purple of the kingdom, and rendered him much honour and glory. Then Daniel, the man greatly beloved, said to Evil-Merodach : " Thy father Nebuchadnezzar never in all his days set the prisoners free, for thus Scripture says of him, 'that let not loose his prisoners to their home' (Isa. xiv. 17). And when the enemies of the Jews filled up their measure of guilt,¹ then Nebuchadnezzar thy father equipped himself, and went up against them, and destroyed their land, and plundered the city of Jerusalem, and burned the holy house with fire, and took the people of Israel captive, and brought them to Babylon, and with them Jehoiachin, king of Judah, whom he bound and kept in prison for thirty-seven years, because he had not submitted to the will of his heavenly Father. Nebuchadnezzar was also exceedingly haughty, and said, There is no king and ruler beside me. As the Scripture expressly says concerning him : ' I will ascend above the heights of the clouds ' " (Isa. xiv. 14).

out the hairs, to prick it, and to treat it with all possible disgrace." Homer narrates at the end of the Iliad that the wrathful Achilles ill-treated Hector in a similar manner. The same happened among the Romans. The Roman people thus ill-treated Strabo, the father of Pompeius (Plut. Life of Pomp. cap. 1). When the Emperor Commodus died, we read (Lampridius, Vit. Commod. cap. xvii.): "Corpus ejus ut uneo traheretur atque in Tiberim mitteretur senatus et populus postulavit." The same was done before to Vitellius, as Suetonius (cap. xvii.) reports. Christian Rome and Constantinople have also witnessed such scenes.

[The friendliness with which the legend treats Evil-Merodach has its origin in 2 Kings xxv. 27. The Talmud (Berachoth 10b) records that Hezekiah dragged the bones of his father Ahaz on a bed of ropes. Munk may have understood it in a Rabbinical sense, i.e. when the Jews have to say something unpleasant of themselves, they speak in the third person. See Rashi on Ex. i. 11.—TRANS.]

In that hour Evil-Merodach did¹ the will of his heavenly Father, and went to the prison and liberated Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim, king of the tribe of Judah, and they brought out all the prisoners with him. What did Evil-Merodach further? He then went to the royal treasuries, and brought out from there the best balms and all kinds of aromatics, and then washed and anointed him (Jehoiachin), and put royal garments upon him, and allowed him to eat at his table all the days of his life. From him Darius the Mede received the kingdom.

That Ahhashverosh, the Persian king, son of Darius, the Median king, that Ahhashverosh (is it) who ordered wine to be brought from a hundred and twenty-seven provinces for a hundred and twenty-seven kings who waited before him, in order that every one of them should drink the wine of his own country which would not injure him. It is that wicked King Ahhashverosh, that fool, who said, "Rather let my kingdom be destroyed than that my decree should not be obeyed." That Ahhashverosh whose counsels were perverse, and whose orders were not right. That Ahhashverosh who commanded that Queen Vashti should appear naked before him, but she did not appear. That Ahhashverosh in whose time the house of Israel was sold for nought, as it is written: "Ye were sold for nought." That Ahhashverosh in whose time Israel's face became black like the sides of a cooking vessel. That Ahhashverosh who ordered to bring cedars from Lebanon and gold from Ophir, but it did not come. That Ahhashverosh in whose days was fulfilled what is written in the law of Moses concerning Israel: "In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even!" (Deut. xxviii. 67). There are five men in connection with whom the relative הוּא is written who are called wicked, and five others who are called righteous. The righteous with whom הוּא is written are: Abraham, Aaron and Moses, Moses and Aaron, Hezekiah, Ezra. The five wicked men are: Nimrod, of whom it is written, "He (הוּא) was a mighty hunter"

(Gen. x. 8). Esau, of whom it is written, “ Esau (אָתָה) is Edom ” (Gen. xxxvi. 8); that Dathan and Abiram, that King Ahaz, that Ahhashverosh. And as the last made promises and did not keep them, his days were shortened; yet he ruled from Hodu in the west unto Cush in the east, over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces. That Ahhashverosh was it who killed his wife for the sake of his friend, and who killed his friend Haman for the sake of his wife. That Ahhashverosh who ruled from Hodu to Cush. But were not Hodu and Cush near each other? The sense is this: As he ruled over Hodu and Cush, which are near each other, so he held unlimited sway over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces and the governments that belonged to them. Similar to this, thou findest in reference to King Solomon, “ He ruled over the whole side of the river from Tiphsah unto Gaza ” (1 Kings v. 4). Were not Tiphsah and Gaza near to each other? But the meaning is, as he ruled over the Tiphsah and Gaza, so he ruled over the whole region of the side of the stream of the world. There were four men who ruled from one end of the world to the other. Two of them belonged to the nations of the world, and two to Israel. Solomon and Ahab were of Israel. In connection with Solomon it is written as said already. Concerning Ahab it is said, “ Is there anywhere a people or a kingdom ? ” The universal kings from the nations are Nebuchadnezzar and Ahhashverosh, only the extent of the latter’s kingdom was shortened, and he ruled but over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces. But why did he deserve to rule over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces? Because God said, “ He will in the future take Esther to wife, who is a descendant of Sarah that lived a hundred and twenty-seven years, so she shall rule over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces.”

§ II.

In those days, when the king Ahhashverosh sat upon his throne, which was prepared for him in Shushan the capital,

This throne was neither his own nor that of his father's, but it was the throne of Solomon, which Hiram, the son of a widow of Tyre, had made with great skill. It was this King Solomon whom the Holy One, blessed be He! set to reign from one end of the world to the other. He chose him before he was born, loved him when he was yet in his mother's womb, revealed to him hidden mysteries, and showed him deep hidden things. He gave him knowledge and wisdom, and an understanding heart from the very beginning. He looked through the persons who came to him to adjudicate their differences so that they could not say what was false before him, for he knew to distinguish between him who was right and him who was wrong. The Lord bestowed upon him splendour and glory, put the royal crown upon his head, and invested him with grace and mercy, as He did once to his father David all his days. He was twenty-three¹ years old on the first day when he received the kingdom. They called him Jedidiah (beloved), because he was beloved of the King of the world, of the Lord of hosts. Thus it is written (and the Lord loved him): "And He sent by the hand of Nathan the prophet, and he called his name Jedidiah" (2 Sam. xii. 25). They called him Solomon (peace), because there was peace in his days. For thus it is written: "And Judah and Israel dwelt safely." They called him Ben² (builder), because he built the temple,

² The glorifying of Solomon in the Jewish legend has its ground in its opposition to Christianity (see my Kaiser und Königsthrone, p. 60). What belonged to the Messiah, the son of David, was transferred to Solomon. The names in Prov. xxx. 1, with the exception of Agur, are here applied to Solomon. Ben is taken in the sense of builder (not son), to give the idea of stone, אבן (as Ben and Ibn). For Christ is also called stone (lapis herillis, in Isa.). When the Targumist says that he is called Yaka, because he was king and lord over the nations, it is because he sees in נֶקְיָה a correspondence to Μέλχισεδ, and derives it from the Greek Μέλχισεδ ἦγει, or we consider נֶקְיָה = נֶקְנָה = Μέλχισεδ. In Bemidbar Rabba, cap. 10 (ed. Amst. 199a), seven names of Solomon are enumerated: Solomon Kohaleth, Jedidiah, Agur, Ben, Yaka, Lemiel, and Ethiel, and so Ben and Yaka are not separated.

as it is written : " I have built Thee an house of habitation " (2 Chron. vi. 2). They called him Ethi-el, " God is with me," because the Word of God was his assistance. And so it is written : " He was wiser than all men." He was called Yaka (commander of obedience) because he was lord and ruler over all the kings of the earth, east and west. And so it is written : " Solomon sat upon the throne of his father David." All the kingdoms feared him, nations and languages were obedient to him ; devils, demons,¹ and ferocious beasts, evil spirits and accidents, were delivered into his hands. Imps brought him all kinds of fish from the sea, and the fowls of heaven, together with the cattle and wild animals, came of their own accord to his slaughter-house to be slaughtered for his banquet. He was rich and powerful in the possession of much silver and gold. He explained parables, solved hidden problems, and made known mysteries without end. His enemies and adversaries became his friends, and all the kings obeyed him. All came to see his face, and longed to hear words of his knowledge. The High One elevated and exalted him for the sake of David His servant. His fame was spread among the kings, and his power among the wise. He was perfect and true, shunned evil, understood the mysteries of heaven, and was wise in divine things. His kingdom was more powerful than all the kingdoms, and his understanding was greater than that of all the children of Mahhol (the globe). They heard everywhere of his fame and of his wise sayings, and all came to salute him. All the kings loved him ; all governors trembled before him ; they brought him their sons and daughters to be his servants, and to run before him ; they desired to sit before him, and yearned to hear the words of his mouth and his wisdom. When he began * to speak, they knelt and prostrated themselves before him ; all who were about to come to him neglected and despised their cities, even hated their places and countries, and came to hear amiable words of wisdom from his lips with which he manifested the praise of the Lord of lords. When he opened his mouth, he spake like a trumpet the praise to the Most High King. To him was given a large key whereby to open the gates of wisdom and understanding of the heart. He understood the languages of birds and of animals, stags and rams ran at his command, lions and tigers seized weapons before him. He understood languages better than all nations, he instructed all schools, all kings and queens trembled before him. All rulers were seized with terror, to him was given the crown of victory, he subdued all men, he was the head of all kings, and (through his influence) no kingdom could take up weapons against another.¹ All kings shook before him, all countries revealed mysteries to him, so that he knew all the secrets of men; because he did works of righteousness and charity, he was from the beginning worthy to be king in this world, and he shall be worthy in the world to come.²

§ III.

This King Solomon was it who had caused a glorious royal throne to be made, covered with gold from Ophir, overlaid with beryl stones, brilliants,³ marble, samaragel, carbuncle, diamonds, pearls, and other precious stones.⁴

For no king was the throne made like it, and no kingdom

² The discovery is highly interesting, that the praise here given to Solomon consists of two alphabetical acrostics, which even compilers of the Targums had failed to notice. The acrostic is forward and backward, and can only be seen in the original. This also is a contrasting imitation of the Byzantine acrostical song of praise in reference to Christ.

could produce similar ones. This throne was made as follows: Twelve lions of gold stood upon it, and opposite to them twelve eagles of gold, a lion opposite an eagle, and an eagle opposite a lion. The right paw of the golden lion was toward the left wing of the golden eagle, and the left wing of the golden eagle was toward the right paw of the golden lion. The sum of all the lions upon it was seventy-two, and there were the same number of eagles. Towards the top, where the king's seat was, the throne was round. It had six steps of gold, as it is written: "The king made a throne of ivory, and this throne had six steps." Upon the first step lay a golden ox, and opposite to it a golden lion; upon the second step lay a golden bear, and opposite to it a golden lamb; upon the third step lay a golden panther, and opposite to it a golden owl; upon the fourth step lay a golden eagle, and opposite to it a golden peacock; upon the fifth step lay a golden cat, and opposite to it a golden hen; and upon the sixth step lay a golden hawk, and opposite to it a golden dove. Upon the throne stood likewise a golden dove, holding a golden hawk in its claws. Thus one day will all the nations and languages be delivered into the hands of King Messiah, and into the hands of the house of Israel. Upon the top of the throne stood a candlestick, properly arranged with lamps, ornaments (or pomegranates), snuffers, ash-pans, cups, and lilies. To one side of the shaft were attached seven pipes, upon which the pictures of the seven patriarchs were engraven. The names of these are as follows: Adam, Noah, his eldest son Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Job among them. To the other side of the shaft were likewise attached seven pipes, upon which were represented seven pious men of the world, whose names are: Levi, Kehath, Amram, Moses, Aaron, Eldad, Medad, and the prophet Haggai among them (or rather Hur).¹ Upon the top of the candlestick stood a golden jar filled with the purest olive oil which supplied the lamps of the temple; and under it was a great golden vessel containing the purest olive oil which supplied the lamps of the candlestick, and upon it was portrayed the high priest. Two branches proceeded from this great vessel, and upon them were depicted the two sons of Eli, namely, Hophni and Phinehas,¹ and out of these branches proceeded two pipes bearing the pictures of two sons of Aaron, viz. Nadab and Abihu. There were also upon it two seats of gold, one for the high priest and the other for the vice high priest. Towards the top of the throne were attached seventy golden chairs, upon which sat the seventy Synhedrists as judges before Solomon. Two doves were sitting, one on each side of the ears of Solomon, in order that he should not be frightened (at the tumult of the judges). On the upper side of the throne were placed twenty-four vines of gold, which formed a shade for the king. And wherever Solomon wanted to go, the throne moved under him upon wheels. When he placed his foot upon the first step, the golden ox raised him to the second, and so it went from the second to the third, from the third to the fourth, from the fourth to the fifth, and from the fifth to the sixth, where the eagles took hold of him and seated him upon the throne. There was also a serpent of silver around the wheels.

When the kings heard the fame of the royal throne of was the father of the architect Bezaleel, and stands everywhere near Moses and Aaron. The Midrash represents him as a martyr. The people wanted him to make the golden calf, which he refused to do, and therefore they killed him. Shemot Rabba, cap. 41, 42, ed. Amst. p. 139. לא היה שם נדול מהור והרנו אותו. The legend seems to have arisen for the sake of excusing Aaron, to show that his life also was in danger.

King Solomon, they assembled themselves and came and bowed before him, and exclaimed : No such throne was ever made for any king, and no nation can manufacture its like ! And when the kings saw its glory, they prostrated themselves and praised the Creator of the World. As oft as King Solomon ascended the throne and sat down, the crown was placed upon his head, and after this a great serpent artificially wound itself, and also lions and eagles rose up and artificially shaded his head, a golden dove descended from one pillar, opened a cabinet and took out the book of the law and placed it in his hands, in accordance with the words of Moses : " And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life," that he and his sons may long reign in Israel.

When the high priest came to salute King Solomon, and all the elders sat on the right and on the left of the throne to administer justice, and there appeared witnesses who wanted to bear false testimony before Solomon, then the wheels moved artificially, the oxen lowed, the lions roared,¹ the bears growled, the lambs bleated, the panthers yelled, the owls hooted, the cats mewed, the peacocks shrieked, the cocks crowed, the hawks screamed, and the birds chirped, and caused terror in the hearts of the false witnesses, so that they said to themselves : " We must bear witness to the truth ; if not, the world will be destroyed on account of us." When King Solomon went up upon the throne, rivers of spices flowed ; and no other king had such a throne. And when the enemies of Israel reached the height of their guilt (see above), the wicked

בְּנֵי נִסָּה, elsewhere בְּרֵנֶסֶת. Levi quotes a MS. on Job xxxix. 29, where the last occurs. The expression son of נִסָּה is somewhat strange. It is certainly a kind of Nisus, by which the sea eagle, the sparrow, and the hawk is sometimes denominated. The name arises from the rapidity of the flight of the bird.

Nebuchadnezzar equipped himself. He went up against them, destroyed their land, plundered the city of Jerusalem, burned the temple, took the people of Israel captive, and brought them to Diblah in the land of Hamath; and with them he also brought the throne of Solomon. And when the wicked King Nebuchadnezzar wanted to ascend and seat himself upon the throne, he did not know that an ascent was effected by artificial means, and so when he put his foot upon the first step, a golden lion stretched out his right paw, and gave him a blow upon his left foot, so that he became lame until the day of his death.¹

After the Babylonian King Nebuchadnezzar, came Alexander the Macedonian and took the throne of Solomon, and brought it to Egypt. When Shishak, king of Egypt, saw this throne, and that it surpassed in beauty all the royal thrones, he wanted to seat himself upon it; but he also did not know that he must ascend by means of artificial wheels, and so when he put his foot upon the first step, a golden lion stretched out his right paw and smote him upon his left foot, and so he was called the lame Pharaoh unto the day of his death. And when Epiphanes,¹ son of King Antiochus, came to Egypt and destroyed it, he took with him the throne of Solomon and brought it into a ship. There a leg of the throne with the chain of gold was broken, and they brought all the artists and goldsmiths of the world to repair it, but they could not do it until this day.

And when his kingdom was at an end, and Cyrus the Persian rose up after him, he for the sake of building the temple had the merit of being able to ascend and seat himself upon the throne of Solomon, the like of which there was not in all the kingdoms.

§ IV.

In the third year of King Nebuchadnezzar the house of Israel wept, groaned, sighed, and exclaimed: "Woe to us! the enemy has prevailed over us, he has plundered our land, destroyed our provinces, carried us into exile, and has done every injustice against us. Our old men he put in chains, our princes he dragged away, our young men he slew with the sword, and our children he took captive! Ah! the crown of our glory is taken from us." For when the kings of the house of David were in existence they reigned over the whole world. After David succeeded Solomon his son, whom the Holy One, blessed be He! made to rule over all the beasts of the field, and over the fowls of the air, and over the creeping things of the earth, and over devils, demons, and spirits, whose language he understood as they also understood his. For thus it is written: "And he spake of trees" (1 Kings iv. 33).

And when the heart of King Solomon was once merry with wine, he sent to invite all the kings of the East and of the West who were near the land of Israel, and he lodged them in the royal palace.² And when again merry with wine, he ordered that the violins, cymbals, tambourines, and harps upon which his father played should be brought to him. And, further merry with wine, he commanded the wild beasts, the birds, the reptiles, the devils, demons, and spirits to be brought, that they should dance before him, to show his greatness to the kings who were staying with him. The royal scribes called them all by their names, and they came together without being bound or forced, and without even a man leading them. At that time, the cock of the wood was missed among the fowls, and was not found. Then the king commanded in anger that he should appear before him, or else he would destroy him. Then the cock of the wood answered and said to King Solomon: "O lord of the earth, incline thine ears and hear my words. Are there not three months since thou hast put counsel in my heart and words of truth upon my tongue? Since then I have not eaten any food, nor drank any water, and have flown all over the world and made an inspection. I thought, Is there a country or a kingdom which is not subject to my lord the king? Then I saw a certain country, the name of whose fortified town is Kitor,¹ whose ¹ קיטור is from קטרת, "frankincense." Saba, in Arabia, was famous for frankincense. Many authors report of it (comp. Ritter, Weihrauch und Weihrauchland in Arabien, xii. p. 356). The note of Strabo is interesting when he says: "τοσαῦτα δὲ ἔστι τὸ πλῆθος (of frankincense) ὥστ' ἀντὶ Τρυγάνων καὶ τῆς κανούμου ὅλης χρῆσθαι κινναμόνια καὶ λατίφια καὶ τοῖς ἄλλοις . . . ἐκ δὲ ἐμπορίας ὡτοι τε (the Sabeans) καὶ Γερραῖοι πλουσιώτατοι πάντων εἰσὶν, ἔχοντες τε παμπληθῆκατασκευὴν χρυσωμάτων τε καὶ αἵγρυνωμάτων, κλινῶν τε καὶ τριπόδων καὶ πρατήρων σὺν ἱκπάμασι καὶ τῇ τῶν οἰκῶν πολυτελείᾳ καὶ γέρθυρόματα καὶ τοῖχοι καὶ ἕροφαι δὲ ἐλέφαντος καὶ Χρυσοῦ καὶ ἀργύρου λιθονοτλήτου τυγχάνει διαποιημένα" (lib. xvi. 4, § 19, ed. Paris, p. 662). "There is such a great quantity of frankincense that they use cinnamon and cassia for fuel instead of faggots and other firewood. Through this commerce, the Sabeans and the Gerrhaons are the richest of all, and they have a great number of gold and silver vessels, of beds, tripods, basins, together with cups and the whole decoration of the houses. Even the doors, walls, and ceilings are decorated with gold, silver, and ivory." Remarkable details, which Ritter had overlooked, are in the fragments of Juba (Frags. Histor. Graecor. iii. 479). Strabo says also: "On account of abundance of servants, the inhabitants are lazy and careless in their manner of life." The authors from which Strabo drew his information tell indeed a strange story of a king of Saba: "It has a king who presides over the court of justice and other things. He is not allowed to leave the palace, the people would at dust is more precious than gold, and where silver lies about like dung in the streets. Trees also are there standing from primeval times, and are watered from the garden of Eden. Great crowds of people are there from the garden of Eden, having crowns upon their heads, who know nothing of warfare, nor can they draw the bow. For, indeed, I have seen one once stone him, in consequence of a saying of an oracle. Not only he, but also all his companions live in effeminate luxury." The Targum evidently regards Saba as Arabia. A curious opinion is found in the Targum on Job i. 15, where, on the words, "and the Sabeans fell upon them," it says: לִילִית מֶלֶכְתָּו מַרְגֵּד וּדְבָרְתִּיןָן. This hitherto unexplained passage is interesting. It should be read, not וּדְבָרְתִּיןָן, but, viz. the Mauritians. The Targum Jerushalmi on Gen. x. 7 has for Saba and Dedan גַּמְרָנָד וּמוֹן. Instead of זַמְרָנָד should be read גַּנְרָנָד or גַּנְרָנָד, viz. Nigrotes, and מוֹן for מוֹג, the Musones, well-known Mauritanian nations. The Targum on Job understands the peoples who fell upon the sons of Job to have been Moors, black people (hence Nigros, from Niger, Mauritaniens). From this is seen why the queen is called לִילִית, who is also understood as a night spectre, from לִילָה, night. Such a one appears here as queen and murderess, because Satan, who is also called the black one (Shahhr), has caused her to be so. There was also a tradition that the Queen of Saba came from Ethiopia, as even Josephus reports (Antiq. viii. 6. 5). An opinion had therefore arisen that Cush stood at the head of the whole race. As לִילִית is here, and לִילִין, spectres, is in the text several times spoken of, I shall add a note upon the peculiar story of Jerushalmi Hhagiga, because the word אֵיִם which occurs there was not properly understood either by Rapaport (Erech Millin, sub voce) or by Wiünsche (Jerus. Talmud, p. 181). It is there told that R. Simon ben Shetahh was judging eighty witches in Askalon. He went there with eighty young men whom he had concealed. He called the witches אֵיִם אֵיִם אֵיִם; but the name is not Greek,—it is not companions,—but rather refers to Jer. l. 39. The Arabic is bne avri, from morning, as Delitzsch has already explained it, according to Bochart (i. 848). Jerome renders this word by Fauni, "a spirit of the forest." The Syriac version renders it by Sirens, which on the whole is correct.

It is also instructive that the Targum on Jer. renders חַתּוֹלִין אֵיִם by cats. The witches, according to the opinion of the ancients, appeared in the form of cats (comp. Grimm, Mythol. 1051; also Ausland, 1855, Nr. 52, p. 500; my Sunem, vol. vii. 256). The people called the witches by such and other names (like weather-cats, thunder-cats, etc.). The saying also of Simon ben Shetahh to the young men, that they must lift them up from the earth in order that they should no more be injurious, was in accordance with the common notion. It was, e.g., taught in connection with lawsuits about witches, that they should not be permitted to touch the ground, otherwise they would again become transformed (comp. Grimm, Mythol. p. 1028). We are reminded of similar ideas in the conflict between Heracles and Antaeus.

woman who rules over them all, and her name is Queen of Saba. Now, if it please my lord the king, I shall gird my loins like a mighty man, and shall arise and go to the city of Kitor, in the land of Saba, and shall bind its kings and governor in chains of iron, and shall bring them to my lord the king." This speech pleased the king, and royal scribes were called, a letter was written and tied to the wings of the cock of the wood, who lifted up his wings and soared up in the air, and compelled other birds to fly with it. Then they came to the city of Kitor, in the land of Saba. Toward morning the queen went out to worship the sea, when the birds obscured the sunlight, so that the queen out of astonishment took hold of her clothes and tore them in pieces. The cock of the wood now came down, and she observed that a letter was tied to its wings, which she at once opened and read what was written therein, as follows: "From me, King Solomon, peace to thee and to thy princes. Thou must certainly know that the Holy One, blessed be He! made me to rule over the wild beasts, over the fowls of the air, over devils, demons, and spirits, and that all the kings of the East and of the West, of the South and of the North, come to salute me. If thou wilt come and salute me, I shall show thee greater dignity than I shall show to all the kings that are sojourning with me; but if thou wilt not come to salute me, I shall send kings, legions, and riders against thee. But if thou wilt ask, What sort of kings, legions, and riders has King Solomon? So know, that the wild beasts are the kings and the legions, and the riders are the birds in the air. My army consists of devils, demons, and spirits, who will strangle you in your beds, the wild beasts will kill you in your houses, and the fowls of the air will devour your flesh in the field." When the queen heard the words of the letter she again rent her clothes. Then she sent for the elders and prominent men, and said to them, "Do you know what King Solomon has sent to me?" They answered, "We do not know Solomon, nor do we esteem his kingdom." But she did not trust them, nor listen to their words, but caused all the ships to be collected and loaded with presents of pearls and of precious stones. And she also sent him six thousand boys and girls who were born in the same year, month, day, and hour, and who were of the same stature and of the same proportion ; and they were all dressed in purple.¹

¹ [בְּנֵי אַרְנוֹן לְבִישָׁה, purple garments. אַרְנוֹן is the known Hebrew נָרְגָּמָן; the בְּn and מָn are undoubtedly corresponding terminations. The letters m and n exchange in all languages (comp. heav-en and himmel, etc.). אַרְגָּמָן is found again in the Greek ἀλουργός, purple-dyed, namely ἄλα, sea, and ἐργά, which has nothing to do with ἔργος, work. Pape's explanation, that it means sea-work, is peculiar in connection with the significance of dye. It surely means the shell-fish from which the purple dye is extracted, just as in Latin murex comes from mare. The words לְבִשָׁה אַרְנוֹנָה correspond to blatteae vestes; blatta is also properly a worm. That blatteus came to mean purple, is to be explained from the use of purple silk. Silk and purple-silk are identical, and blatteus of silk is connected with words in which it means only purple-dyed, like blatteus colour. Eutrop. speaks of blattei funes. A senator was called blattifer. From this the use has arisen of even saying, sericoblatta and pallium blattoserium (comp. Gerard, Joh. Voss. de theologia Gentili, p. 1612). From this promiscuous use of purple dye and of silk material arose the expression of "silkworm" and "purple worm;" but we shall touch upon this afterwards. About the names of silk there is yet something to be said. In the Mishna (Kilayim, § 9. 1) the word בֶּלֶד stands near שִׁירִים, which scholars have long ago recognised as related to sericum. But the opinion that שִׁירִים must be read somewhat like seris or serie cannot be allowed, for even the Armenians also, the great merchants, say sheram for "silk."¹ More interesting and difficult is the word which the Jerusalem Talmud has in the same passage, viz. מַטְבָּסָה, which should be read מַטְבָּסָה, Gr. μέταξα or μέταξα (ed. Krotoschin, p. 32a). Another passage in which it occurs is found in Bereshith Rabba, § 40, p. 35c (ed. Amst.). When Abraham was on his journey to Egypt he had locked up his wife in a box, in order to conceal her from the Egyptians. Arrived in Egypt, he was asked to pay duty for his goods. He said that he was ready to pay for everything, only they must not open that particular box. They said to him : "Hast thou gold in it (תִּיעַן)? then pay duty; or hast thou silk (מַטְבָּסִי)? pay duty." Metuxa was then here used for valuable articles which are taxed, as it stands between gold and pearls, מְרַגְּלִין (comp. Yalkut Shimoni, n. 67). There is a curious passage in Bereshith Rabba, chap. 77, p. 67c (comp. Yalkut Shimoni, n. 132, ed. Venice, i. 39a), where we read : "R. Hhiya Rabba and R. Simon had business with Metuxa, and they also

She wrote a letter and sent it through them, which ran as follows : "From the city of Kitor to the land of Israel is indeed a journey of seven years, but owing to the questions which I have to ask thee, I shall come in three years." After three years, the Queen of Saba really came to King Solomon, found a forgotten parcel of silk (מְחִילָא דְמַטְבֵּסִין). The word has not yet been explained. It is Persian and Arabic, لِحَن is quilts and other utensils. מְחָלֵט is in Arabic volumen, "a book," as well as storea (comp. Freytag, Lex. Arab. i. 290a). Interesting is the mention of Metaxa by Gush Chaleb of Giscala in Koheleth Rabba (ed. Amst. 65b). The mentioning of the word in these passages is important, because it shows how groundless is the doubt which ancient scholars have thrown upon the use of metaxa in the title of Marcianus which was received in the Pandects (De Publicanis et Vectigibus, lib. 39, iv. 16. 7), and which they held as interpolated. They assert that, in the enumeration of metaxa vestes serica sub serica vel attincta, Tribonian has interpolated the word metaxa. This opinion is groundless when contemporaries of Marcian (R. Hhiya) use the word. Rather are the words "Vestis serica" to be considered as a gloss. The word also occurs in Cod. Theod. (lib. 10, tit. xx. de Murilegibus; comp. Jus. Cib. Antejustin, ed. Hugo, p. 777) in an edict of the year 406, and—which is not surprising—in Cod. Justin (lib. 8, tit. xvi. 28, de pignoribus) in an edict of the year 528. All these quotations are older than those which Du Cange has (Gloss. Graec. p. 917), where Hesychius and Menander occupy the first rank. Michaelis (in Castelli, Lex. Syr. p. 495) quotes it Syr. מְטַכְּבֵשׁ, without giving the source of the quotation. It must not be overlooked that metaxae is used by Vitruvius, vii. 3, in the senses of "coil" and "skein." In Turkish Tartaric also, silk was originally called ipek jipek (Vambery, Die primitive Cultur der Turktataren, p. 88). Metaxa is also twisting (stria taenia), like twisting of hair (comp. Reiske, Zu Constant Porphyr. ii. 791). Festus quotes it from Lucilius, as is further to be seen by Alberti on Hesychius, sub voce σής. A sufficient etymological explanation of the word is not yet given. Ritter has found none in his sources (Geogr. viii. 708), and Lassen says (Ind. Alterthumskunde, i. 321, note): "The word μέταξα is still of obscure origin among the later Greeks." Salmasius (comp. Vopisc. Aurelian, ed. Haack, ii. p. 540) is of opinion that the name that was applied to a silk thread afterwards signified silk in general. This is improbable. He thought of a formation of μίτος (from μίω) like περισσοι, and περιξ from περι, and like σμιλος and ομιλαξ. Braun, De Vestitu Sac. Hebr., approved of this, and thought that μέταξα is for μετάξις, which is unacceptable. I think that the explanation of metaxa has its analogy in the other names which silk had in the East and in the West. The spinning of silk by a worm has ever been the astonishment of nations. Legend and fiction are connected with it. Gervasius of Tilbury has the strangest story in his Otia Imprialia, chap. lvi. (Leibnitz, i. 978): "Est enim a sui principio quasi semen sinapis minutissimum cumque tempus panniculum inclusum coactum illud semen in sinu dominarum ac virginum who, when he heard of her arrival, sent Benayahu, son of Yehoyada, to meet her. He was beautiful as sunrise (or like Venus the lustrous star), and like the white lily which stands by brooks of water. Now when the Queen of Saba saw Benayahu, son of Yehoyada, she dismounted from her riding tenetur; beneficio caloris vivifactum foliis mori supponitur et super tabulam vernuculi extensi nutrimentum folium mori in brevi crescent ad grossorum vermium quantitatem," etc. According to the Arab legend, Solomon wanted to have a thread brought through a diamond, so he commanded Satan to bring a worm to do it. He brought the worm, which, after accomplishing the work, left a silk thread behind. When Solomon wanted to reward the worm, it besought him to be allowed to choose a fruit tree for its dwelling, and he assigned to it the mulberry tree (Weil bibl. Legenden, p. 263). Paulus Silentarius poetizes of silk, "Als dem Gespiunt der fremden emsigen Würmer" (ed. Kortüm. near Salzenberg, Altchristl. Bandenk. p. xlvi.). In a Roman Catholic book of songs (Bamberg, 1628, p. 483, v. Degen) we read,—

"Was ist der Seyden Pracht, Wer hat die Pracht gemacht ?
Es haben Wurm gemacht
Den ganzen Seydenpracht."

Even the traveller Olarius exclaims, "What wonderful work of nature there is in such a little worm in its variation, work, and production!" Owing to this, most of the names of silk are called after the worm. In Mahabarata, silk is called Kitaga, worm-product (comp. Lassen, Ind. Alterth. ii. pp. 564, 614, note). The well-known Sericum has long ago been derived from the name of the worm, called in Mongol. sirkek, in Mandshu sirghi, in Corean sir, in Chinese sze or szu (the Chinese have no r). From the Greek bombyx, caterpillar, silk dresses were called bombycinius. Hesychius adduces a name βρύθαξ (βρύθανες) for silk stuff, from a form βρύτον, which is a worm (perhaps the German Brut) (comp. Salmasius on Tertullian de Pallio, p. 240).

The Latin blatta, "moth," is in well-known use applied to materials of silk. As already remarked, we meet with blattei funes, blattei, blattifer senatus, with which the idea of purple-dyed is connected (comp. Voss, De theologia gentili, p. 1012). The best known name was Seide (silk), derived from the Greek σῆς (in older forms, gen. σεος and then σήτος), originally also the moth. In the MIDDLE AGES it was called Seta, and the name came with the silk from Byzantium (comp. Du Cange, and Ritter, viii. pp. 708-9). The Aruch also mentions the name as שִׁידָא in the twelfth century in Italy. The name passed then over into French, as soie (from sida, like foi from fides, and vair from videre). It is found as שְׂוִיאָה in Rashi on Ezek. xvi. 10. The Greek σῆς is the same as the Hebrew סֵדֶם, for which also it is given in the Greek version on Isa. li. 8. Elsewhere it stands for ψυ (Isa. i. 9; Job iv. 19, xxvii. 18), and for רַקְבָּה (Prov. xiv. 32, etc.).

Doubtful is the Persian Ebrisim (Vullers, Lex. i. 67), Armenian aprsoum animal. "Why," asked Benayahu, son of Yehoyada, "dost thou dismount from thy riding animal?" She rejoined, "Art not thou King Solomon?" He replied, "I am not King Solomon, but one of his servants who attend upon him." Thereupon she turned to her great men, and said this proverbial saying: "If you do not see the lion, you see his lair; though you do not see King Solomon, yet you see a handsome man who stands before him." Then Benayahu conducted her to the king, who, when he heard that she was coming, went and sat down in an apartment of glass. When the queen saw the king sitting there, she thought in her heart, and in fact (eproum), which also passed into Arabic (Freytag, i. pp. 2, 3). Also Abreshum (Ebreshum) in Georgian (Güldenstädt, Reise nach Georgien, ed. Klaproth, p. 93). The extensive and interesting explanation of Haug in the Göttinger gelehrten Anzeigen, 1854 (26, 27, Stück vom, 11 Feb. p. 259), is not decisive. אַבְרִיסָם is nothing else than the Greek έωπετόν, "worm," "reptile."

According to these analogies, which show that the name for silk was derived from the name that was given to "worm" and "moth," there can now be no doubt that we must in the same way explain the word metaxa, and that from a name which was widely known, namely from the moth itself (with which probably the German word Made, "maggot," is related). It is called in Old North German madkr, Swedish madk, Danish madike, maddik. The Low German forms sound maddik, meddike, metke. It was rightly supposed that it is connected with the Sanscr. form matka and the Persian miteh, moth (comp. Vullers, ii. 1250). This derivation has also ethnographical value. When one meets in the East a name for silk having an Old Germanic origin, he is reminded of the Sers, who were always merchants of silk, of whom Pliny (Hist. Nat. vi. chap. xvii. No. 88, ed. Sillig, i. 434) says, that they were on this side of the Emodos: "Seras ab ipsis adspici notos etiam commercio . . . ipsos vero excedere hominum magnitudinem, rutilis comis, caeruleis oculis, oris sono truci, nullo commercio lingue de," which indicates a Germanic type. What Lassen says (ii. 359) cannot militate against this. The remarkable traits of nations often indicate names. The Germanic nations now call silk by a Greek name. The Byzantine ages transmitted a name which was essentially Germanic.

In English, silk is rightly supposed to have received the name from Sericus, which has come from the Chinese and Tartar peoples. In the Old Testament the word מִשֵּׁי appears. This also has not been known until now. I hold it to be the same as μίτραξα, also that מִטְשֵׁי=מִשֵּׁי=מִשֵּׁי, like the Persian miteh, Greek μίδας, Old High German mizo, French mite, motte, English moth, mite, and must be like the similar forms mentioned above which had received the letter k (comp. Dieffenbach, Goth. Wörterb. i. p. 6). In מִשֵּׁי is clearly seen the meaning of worm.

said, that he was sitting in water, and she raised her dress to cross the water, when the king noticed that her foot was full of hair. He said to her, "Thy beauty is the beauty of women, and thy hair is the hair of men; hair is becoming to a man, but to a woman it is a shame." The Queen of Saba then said: "My lord king! I will give thee three riddles¹ which if thou shalt solve, I will acknowledge that thou art a wise man ; but if not, then thou art a man like all the rest."

She asked, "What is berries of wood and buckets of iron which draw up stones and pour out water ?" He answered, "A tube of paint." "What is," she asked again, "a thing which comes as dust from the earth, eats dust, is poured out as water, and sticks to a house ?" He answered, "It is naphtha." She further asked, "What is that which as an oracle (or as a storm) goes at the head of all, cries loudly and bitterly with its head bowed down like a rush, is a cause of praise to the free, of shame to the poor, of honour to the dead, of disgrace to the living, of joy to the birds, and of grief to the fish ?" He answered, "It is flax." She exclaimed, "I would not have believed it had I not come here and seen it with mine own eyes ; and behold the half has not been told me, for thy wisdom and thy goodness surpass the report I have heard. Blessed are thy people, and blessed are § 20) said : "God had made for them garments of לְנִים, 'linen ;'" for which Wünsche (Midrash Rabba, p. 95), curiously enough, read נַיִלָּה, "garments of the skin of a hare." The riddle which we have here is more intelligible and instructive than that contained in the symposium which is ascribed to Lactantius,—

"Major eram longe quondam, dum vita manebat
Sed nunc examinis lacerata, ligata, revulsa Dedita sum terrae, tumulo sed condita sum."

Simrock made a peculiar mistake in his German book of riddles. In No. 13 he gives us the riddle thus :—

"In days gone by when young I was green,
A robe for counts and princes I've been ;
And when I am old and not much use,
My learning then is great and profuse."

This is evidently flax. Linen becomes at last rags, and rags become paper. But in the list of the solutions of the riddles, the cherry is given for No. 13. On the other hand, riddle No. 22 is as follows :—

"A damsel sits upon a tree,
Her gown is red as red can be,
Within her heart a stone I see,
Guess now, I pray, what this may be."

The solution is a cherry ; but in Simrock's list, flax is given for it. The copyist must have confounded the two solutions.

these thy servants who are about thee!" Thereupon he brought her into the tribunal¹ (or an apartment) of the royal palace. Now, when the Queen of Saba saw his greatness and glory, she praised the Creator, and said: "Blessed be the Lord thy God, whom it has pleased to set thee upon the throne of the kingdom to do justice and right." She then gave the king plenty of gold and silver, and he gave her what she desired. And the kings of the West and of the East, of the North and of the South, who heard of his fame, came tremblingly from their various places with extraordinary dignity, and they presented him with much gold and silver, and with pearls and precious stones.

§ V.

And when the enemies of Israel filled up the measure of their guilt (or when Israel were guilty), the prophet² Jeremiah uttered many prophecies to them; and as they did not listen to him, the Holy Spirit persuaded him, and led him away into the land of the tribe of Benjamin. Thus it is written:

² This narrative about Jeremiah is owing to a curious homily upon two sentences in his prophecy. Tradition assumed that he really did what is told in the above quotation from Jer. xxxvii. 12, and it therefore understood by the "gate of Benjamin," not a city gate by which people went to Benjamin, but a gate in the country of Benjamin itself. It connected with this Jer. xx. 7, where the prophet exclaims: "O Lord, Thou hast persuaded me, and I was persuaded; Thou hast forcibly taken hold upon me, and hast prevailed," and understood by these words that Jeremiah was led by the Spirit to go to Benjamin, but his heart failed him, and he went instead to Jerusalem, and therefore it was conquered by the enemy. For this the prophet laments, "Thou hast persuaded me." A similar tradition is in Midrash Echa (i. 5, ed. Amst. 47a) concerning R. Zadok. About him said R. Johhanan to Vespasianus: "If such a man were yet in Jerusalem, thou wouldest not be able to take the city with double thy force." Another like saying is told of the siege of Bether, which, so long as R. Eliezer המזרע (not of Modin, as Wünsche says), lived in it, was preserved on account of his piety (Midrash Echa, ii. 1, ed. Amst., p. 52b).

"Then Jeremiah went forth out of Jerusalem to go into the land of Benjamin." But so long as Jeremiah was in Jerusalem he prayed to the heavenly Father, and the city was not delivered into the hands of the Chaldeans, and they did not destroy it. But when he went into the land of Benjamin, then came up Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, and destroyed the land of Israel, plundered the city of Jerusalem, and burned the temple with fire. While yet the tyrant Nebuchadnezzar was dwelling in Antiochian Ribla, he sent the chief executioner, Nebuzaradan, who razed the walls of the city Jerusalem to the ground. And when the prophet Jeremiah arrived, and saw that the city was destroyed, and that the Chaldeans surrounded it on every side, he cried aloud, and wept much and bitterly, and said: "Thou, O Lord, hast persuaded me, and I was persuaded; Thou hast forcibly taken hold upon me, and hast prevailed." And when the wicked Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, heard that Jerusalem was conquered, he assembled all the troops of the Chaldeans, and came to avenge himself against the temple. He thoughtfully shook his head, and pointed with his hands here and there, as the fate of Sennacherib's camp was known to him, against which angels from heaven were sent, who slew eighteen myriads and five thousand riders, so that of Sennacherib's camp only he remained.

Ribla is the place where Nebuchadnezzar encamped, where Zedekiah's eyes were taken out, and his sons killed before him. It is supposed to be the same as the present Ribleh, 10 to 12 hours distant from Homs, on the Orontes (El Asy), in the northern part of Bekoa (comp. Robinson, Palestine, iii. 747). The Rabbis have identified it with Antioch, or Daphne near Antioch, where they think Nebuchadnezzar sojourned for a time.

The Midrash Echa states twice that he tarried בְּפָנֵי שֶׁל אַנְטוֹכִיא (ed. Amst., 51a at the close of the Introduction, and 58c), where, by the way, Wiinsche has not correctly rendered it by Daphne Antiochena. It is called in Greek, as by Josephus (Jewish Wars, i. 13.5, etc.), Ἀντιόχεια Δάφνη, and

He cast arrows,¹ consulted the oracle; he threw an arrow westward, and it fell in the direction of Jerusalem; then eastward, and it fell in the direction of Jerusalem; and then again he threw an arrow towards the guilty city (i.e. Rome)— not seldom Ἀντιόχεια ἐπὶ Δάφνη (see Ritter, xvii. 1163). The reason why the Rabbis identify Ribla with Daphne is more of an ethical than a historical character. What Ribla was for Nebuchadnezzar, the same was Daphne for the Syrian and the Roman kings. There in the Orient was their seat. Thence issued all the misery that came upon the besieged.

¹ In Ezek. xxi. 25 we have that grand passage which informs us that Nebuchadnezzar was in doubt whether he should march against Rabbath Ammon or against Jerusalem.

“He stood at the parting of the way, at the head of two ways, to use divination; he shook the arrows” (לְקַלְקֵל חֲזִים). Upon the meaning of the word לְקַלְקֵל a good deal has been conjectured. It is of an onomatopoetic kind, and is connected with Βάλλειν, “to throw.” Throwing was used in the sense of casting a die (comp. balloter), like the Latin Alea, has arisen from the Greek iάλλω, “to throw” (comp. my Spielhaus auf Monte Carlo, p. 23). The commentators have mostly been influenced by what Jerome says on this passage, but they overlooked that he (ed. Migne, v. p. 206) confounded belomantia, “arrow-divination,” with mace-divination, which was not, nor could be, the same. The examples of Arabic usage by Van Dale (De Orig. et Progr. Idolatriæ, etc. p. 456), and quoted from Herbelot, do not appear to be applicable (Voc. Aeda.). It was, on the other hand, overlooked that Haman cast the lot, and chose the thirteenth day, which was called Tir, “an arrow,” for issuing his destructive decree. See my Commentary on Esther, p. 103. There would be more ground for Chwolsohn’s reminder of Sabian usage (Sabier, ii. 200) if he had not laid stress upon the extinguishing of the torch. The ancient Jewish expositors are right when they speak of “the shooting of the arrow.” The decision depended upon the direction in which the arrow fell. Rashi has well translated the words “shooting an arrow” by the French טרא איה, which should he read טרא טרייה, “tirer trait.” It was a kind of casting the lot when Jonathan shot an arrow to give a sign to David (1 Sam. xx. 21), and Elisha prophesied by the shooting of arrows concerning the victory of Joash over Syria (2 Kings xiii. 15). The Targum uses the homily of the Midrash as in Echa Rabbathi (ed. Amst. p. 39a), but gives it more correctly than it is in Midrash Echa. The latter appears to have taken the word לְקַלְקֵל in the sense of calculari, “to reckon” the arrows. The Targum is more explicit when it says, “He shot towards the west and the east, and it fell towards Jerusalem; he then shot towards the city which is guilty, that it should soon be rooted out from the world (by which it means Rome, as is expressly said in Midrash Echa), and it rebounded towards Jerusalem.” The time for its destruction had come, and Nebuchadnezzar, as the tradition tells, was directed by his oracle to undertake the siege reluctantly, for he remembered what had happened to Sennacherib. The Midrash Echa speaks also of a divination, upon which both Ezekiel and the Targum are may it soon be rooted out from the world!—and this also fell towards Jerusalem.

Then he arose and sent his generals against Jerusalem, whose names were Nargal, Sharezer, Shamgar, Nebosar, Sechim, Rabsaris, and Rabmag, i.e. Chief-eunuch, and Chief-magus. He silent. It says: “Nebuchadnezzar lit candles and torches (נרות ופנסים), and appointed them for Rome, and they were extinguished; for Alexandria, and they were again extinguished; finally, he appointed them for Jerusalem, and they burned.” Chwolsohn would have been right in connecting this with the Sabian custom, according to which an arrow was fastened to a torch, and if it burned, it bore an omen of good fortune; and if it was extinguished, it bore an omen of misfortune (Sabier, ii. 26 and p. 201).

טְבִנָּה, Syriac טְבִנָּה, occurs also in compounds, as in Midrash Koheleth, p. 63a (ed. Amst.), קְסַלְפֶּנֶם, viz. ξυλοφάνης, ξυλοφάνιος, a wooden torch (ξυλολόχνος, comp. Spanheim, de Praest. Numism., ed. Amst., iv. p. 128). Through this rare word a passage in Hesychius is explained. He says there, under Ιχθούς: αἰστρον . . . ξυλοφάνιον. Some, like Spohn, corrected this by οκαπάνη, which is altogether unnecessary, as the passage in the Midrash shows. ξυλοφάνιον is, like ξυλοφάνης, “a piece of wood which was applied to torches.” קְסַלְפֶּנֶם is here used in contrast to מְקוֹתְפֶּנֶם. They are lanterns with net-laces. The Greeks also used with the word λύχνος such words as δίμνξος and πολυμώξος; (see Stephanus, sub voce μίξα, and Wüstemann, Der Palast des Scaurus, p. 133). Indeed, we also know from mediaeval legends, that arrows were applied to purposes of witchcraft. In the Gesta Romanorum, n. 102, we read of a certain cleric who wished to marry a man’s wife during his absence in a distant place, so he placed a wax figure and shot an arrow upon it, intending thereby to kill the man in the distance. This man was just then in Rome, where he was warned by a wise man of the danger he was in. He showed it to him in a magic mirror while he was in the bath. He then dipped his head under the water, and thus escaped the danger, while the arrow which the cleric shot rebounded upon himself. Another wonderful story is told in Gesta Romanorum, cap. 10 f. There was once a beautiful secret chamber which contained an image with precious stones, into which a cleric entered clandestinely, with the intention of stealing. Then the image upon which was sculptured an arrow and a bow, shot an arrow upon a luminous carbuncle, and this caused thick darkness as in the night. In the eleventh narrative of the English edition (ed. Grässle, ii. 339) it is told: A knight once shot a beautiful bird that sang gloriously, in consequence of which a mountain was cleft in two, and then sank into the abyss. In the Image du Monde it is told that the Apostle Paul had visited the grave of Virgil to find his books. He entered it, and saw a lamp hanging from the roof, and an archer stood before Virgil ready to shoot. When he was about to take the books, the archer shot an arrow upon the lamp, and then everything was turned into dust (comp. Virgili im Mittelalter übersetzt von Dütschke, p. 265).

followed his generals and entered the temple, and thus exclaimed, "Art Thou the great God who has stirred us up, and brought us against Thy city and against Thy temple?"

But when the gate of the temple saw the unclean people standing against it, it shut itself, and would by no means open. Then came all the army of the Chaldeans, and brought with them three hundred and sixty camels laden with iron axes; but the external gates of the temple destroyed them, and continued not to open themselves until Parnitus¹ came and slew a swine, and sprinkled its blood upon the temple, and defiled it.

After the temple was defiled, the gate opened, and then the wicked Nebuchadnezzar went in and sat down in the hall of Zechariah, son of Yohoiyada the high priest, and he saw his (Zechariah's) blood moving upon the ground. So he asked the elders of Israel, "Whose blood is this?" They answered, "We had a prophet amongst us who reproved us; but we did not hearken to his words, but rose up and slew him in the temple."²

² The awful story about the blood of the prophet is in allusion to 2 Chron. xxiv. 22, where it is recorded that Zechariah, the slain prophet, uttered these last words: "The Lord look upon it (i.e. my blood), and require it." They connected this passage with Hos. iv. 2: "Blood toucheth blood." The underlying thought is, that blood boils up when the murderer comes near it. The blood of Zechariah continued to boil until Nebuchadnezzar came. Even then it was not pacified, however many were slain,—for the murderer was still there,—and only at last out of pity it became still (see my Symbolik des Blutes, p. 22, etc.). The story is told in various ways in Echa Rabbathi, p. 39a, b. Comp. Bab. Gittin, 57b; Sanhedrin 96b. [He appears to have been the same as in Matt. xxiii. 35. The first component parts interchange as in Jehoiakim, who was called Eliakim. Jerome says that the Gospel of the Nazarenes read the son of Jehoiada.—TRANS.]

When the wicked Nebuchadnezzar heard these words, he said to them: "Go and bring me four thousand young priests." These he slew over that blood, and yet it would not enter the earth, until Nebuchadnezzar rebuked it by saying, "Shall thy whole people be destroyed for thy sake!" After this it was absorbed by the earth. Then the high priest, seeing that the priests were killed, put on his upper garment and the ephod, took the keys of the temple in his hands, and went upon the roof of the temple and called out: "The house is now given back to its Lord, and the keepers are no more in it!" Thereupon he threw himself into the burning pile and was consumed. When the remaining priests saw that the high priest was burned, they took their violins and harps, and all their other musical instruments, and likewise threw themselves into the fire, and were burned.

When Nebuchadnezzar wanted now to enter the Holy of Holies, the doors closed and would not open until an echoing voice from heaven exclaimed, and said, "Open, Libanon, thy gates!" After this a door opened itself, and the wicked Nebuchadnezzar defiled the Holy of Holies by entering into it; and he saw there the glories of the King of all the worlds, of the Lord of hosts. But when he saw that the holy vessels which the priests and the kings of the house of David used were sunk into the earth, he was very wroth, and hastened away and slew a great number; and many others he took captive, and led the people of Israel into exile, bound in iron chains, naked, and carrying sand upon their necks. The prophet Jeremiah went with them until he reached the graves of the patriarchs. Here he wept, and cried: "O our merciful fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob! arise from your graves and behold your children, the people of Israel, are led into captivity!" Then answered the Holy Spirit and said to him: "I have long ago told thee, O prophet Jeremiah, that I have withdrawn my peace." He then rose up from the graves of the fathers and went to the graves of the mothers, and prostrated himself, and cried, "O merciful mothers, Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, and Leah ! arise from your 'graves and see your sons and daughters, the people of Israel, whom you have brought up in the truth, are going barefoot into captivity !' " The Holy Spirit then answered : " A voice was heard in Ramah," etc. He then arose from the graves of the mothers, and went to the graves of the prophets, and prostrated himself, and cried : " O merciful prophets, Moses and Samuel ! arise from your graves and see the people of Israel, whom you have led in the truth, are going barefoot into captivity." The Holy Spirit answered and said : " I have long ago told thee, O prophet Jeremiah, ' If even Moses and Samuel should stand before me,' " etc. He then rose up from the graves of the prophets, and went and prostrated himself in the house (or upon the graves) of the mourners, and said : " Bring me 'the bread of the mourners to eat, and the cup of comfort to drink,' for I mourn for the people of Israel who went into captivity." The Holy Spirit answered and said : " Do not go into the house of mourning." Thus Jeremiah mourned, wept, and groaned concerning the people of Israel who went into exile naked, and carrying sand upon their necks, they and their kings and princes and governors, until they reached a place which is called Beth-Coro,¹ where they changed their garments. Then Jeremiah said to Nebuchadnezzar the wicked, and to all the army of the Chaldeans who came with him, " Do not go to your idols and praise them. Rather know that you have only killed and taken captive a people which was already captured and killed." They then went on until they reached a certain country, where Jeremiah bitterly wept and sobbed. Two tears fell from his eyes, which became there two fountains that exist to this day.

When the people of Israel had arrived at the rivers of Babylon, the wicked King Nebuchadnezzar said to them: "Let those singers who used to sing before your Lord in Jerusalem come and sing before me." When the Levites heard this, they hung up their harps on the willows which stood by the rivers of Babylon. For thus it is written: "By the rivers of Babylon," etc. The Levites, moreover, said to Nebuchadnezzar the tyrant: "Had we done the will of our heavenly Father, and had we praised Him in Jerusalem, we should not have been delivered into thy hands. But how can we now sing the praise of our Lord before thee?" For thus it is written: "How shall we sing the Lord's song," etc. When Nebuchadnezzar the wicked heard this, he said: "Kill them, for they have transgressed the command of the king!" Then an Israelite, by the name of Pelatya, son of Yohoiyada, said to him: "When one delivers his flock to a shepherd, and a bear comes and snatches away a sheep, of whom will it be required?" He answered, "From the shepherd will it be required." Pelatya then said: "Let thy ears hear what thy mouth has spoken." Then the king ordered to bring Zedekiah before him, and they removed the chains of iron and of brass from him, and changed his captive garments for others.

§ VI.

"In the third year of his reign, he made a feast for all the princes and ministers of Persia and Media, and for all the governors of the districts. They were clothed in silk and purple garments, ate and drank, and rejoiced before him."

It is not said here, he showed them his riches, but "he showed them the riches of his glorious kingdom." By which riches is to be understood, that which came from the temple. For a mortal eye has no riches, but all riches belong to God; as it is written, "Mine is the silver and the gold, saith the Lord of hosts." During a hundred and eighty days he showed them daily six treasures, as it is written, "riches, honour, dominion, glory, majesty, greatness" (Esther i. 4),—so then six expressions. But when the Israelites saw there the vessels of the temple, they did not remain any longer. The king was told that the Jews did not want to take refreshment, because they saw there the vessels of the temple, and so he ordered that they should have another banquet for themselves.

When those days were ended, the king said: "Now I will make a feast for all the inhabitants of my city, for all the people that are found in Shushan, both small and great." They were brought to the royal garden where fruit and spice trees stood, some of which were broken and arranged for arbours, and others were planted for shades; seats also were prepared, and the paths were strewn with costly stones and pearls.—And they drank out of golden cups and bowls; and when one drank of a cup, he did not drink of the same again, but he was given a new cup. The cups were of various descriptions, as it is written: "And the vessels were diverse from one another." But when they brought out the vessels of the temple, and the heathen began to pour wine into them, the appearance of the vessels became different from what they were. And for this reason it is said: "The vessels being diverse from one another;" "And royal wine was (רַב) in abundance." That is, the wine was older than the person who drank it. For example, the butlers asked a man how old he was, and he said forty years, and so they gave him wine forty years old; and thus they did with every man. For this reason it is written: "And royal wine was in abundance." And the drinking was according to regulation, so that it could hurt no one. Why could it not hurt? Because when at royal feasts generally, a cup was given to a Persian containing from four to five Hemins (a certain measure that was called Pithka¹), he had to drink the whole out in one breath. Owing to this the butlers used to become rich, for no Persian guest could be found able to drink the whole cup at once, and therefore they used to beckon to the butlers to take it away for a certain sum of money. But Ahhashverosh gave order that no such cups should be given this time, but that every one should drink as much as he liked. Therefore it is written : "And the drinking was according to law." Vashti also made a feast for the women, and gave them red wine,¹ and seated them in the palace, in order to show them its riches. They asked her various question, for they wanted to know everything, e.g. where the king eats, drinks, and sleeps ; and she showed them all the places. Therefore it is written : "In the royal house."

On the seventh day, when the king and the hundred and twenty-seven crowned princes who were with him were merry with wine, a dispute arose among them about indecent things. The kings of the West said, Our women are the handsomest. The others said the same of their women. Ahhashverosh also took part in the dispute, and in his drunken freak said : "There are no more beautiful in the world than the Babylonian ; but if you will not believe me, I shall send for the Babylonian wife which I have in the palace, and you shall see that she surpasses in beauty all your wives." Immediately King Ahhashverosh sent seven eunuchs to the queen. He said : "Go and say to Queen Vashti : Arise from thy royal throne, strip thyself naked,² put the crown upon thy head, take a golden cup in thy right hand and another in thy left, and thus appear before me and the hundred and twenty-seven crowned kings, that they may see that thou art the fairest of all women." She refused. Vashti answered to the seven eunuchs : "O shame. Go and tell your master, the fool,— you also are fools like him,—I, Queen Vashti, am the daughter of Babylonian kings of more ancient times. My ancestor Belshazzar drank as much wine as a thousand persons, and yet the wine never made him so silly as to utter such improper words as thou hast to me.” Then they went and told the king the reply of Queen Vashti. And when he heard it, his anger was kindled, and he again sent the seven eunuchs, saying to them : “ Go and say to her, If thou dost not hearken to me, and dost not appear before me and before these kings, I shall cause thee to be slain, and thy beauty will perish.” The nobles came to her with the message, and she did not honour them, but said : “ Go and tell the foolish king, whose counsel is as much folly as his command is unjust, I am Queen Vashti, the daughter of Evil-Merodach and granddaughter of Nebuchadnezzar. Ever since I was born no man has seen my body except thou alone, and if I now appear before thee and before the hundred and twenty-seven crowned kings, the end will be, they will slay thee and marry me.” Now a noble Persian lady said to Queen Vashti : “ Even if the king should kill thee, and cause thy beauty to perish, thou must by no means dishonour the name of thy ancestors, and thou must not show thy body to any man, except to the king alone.”

At the same time the nobles told the king that Vashti refused to obey the command which he sent to her by the eunuchs, and his wrath quite overpowered him. Then the king laid the matter before the sages and statesmen, for royal affairs are brought before those who are acquainted with laws and statutes. There were some in the cabinet council who were from near, and others who were from a distance. Those from near were Carshena¹ from Africa, Shethar from India,

The Targum does not use a scientific method in its explanation, but rather bases it upon a fanciful hypothesis, that the names of these men indicate the places they came from. Thus אַדְמָתָא has some similarity with אֶדוֹם, therefore he must be an Edomite. So also Carshana or Admatha from Edomaea, Tarshish from Egypt, Meres-Marsena from Meres, a distant country, Memucan from Jerusalem. To those seven great Persians and Medes, who looked upon the king's face and were of the first rank, he communicated the royal order which he sent to Vashti by the eunuchs. Then said Memucan, who is Daniel. But why is he called Memucan? Because when the tribe of Judah were taken captive to Babylon,—Hananiah, Mishael, Azariah were among them,—Daniel also was exiled, through whom great, wonderful, and mighty works were done, and again through whom heaven determined that Queen Vashti should be killed, in consequence of which he was called Memucan, i.e. "establisher." And Memucan spake to the king and governors—there was a royal statute at the time which provided, that in the cabinet consultations the younger ministers should give their advice first. If it was Carshena must be an African, because it sounds like Carthage. Near this stands, שתר, and he is said to have come from הנך. This is done on the ground of the explanation of the Targum of the words "sons of Cush," viz. צינראַי הנך, סמְרָאַי, לוּבָאַי וּנוּנָאַי. The last are the Tingitani. Zinghi. For must be read סמְרָאַי, the Numidians. הנך are the Hindoos=Ethiopians; and for must be read סינְרָאַי, the Cyrenians. On account of the vicinity of these in Africa, the Targumist has assigned שתר to הנך, by which he thought of the real India. In consequence of this he assigns מצרים, Egypt, to Tarshish. In another place (1 Kings xxii. 49; Jer. x. 9) the Targum has for Tarshish, Africa; and the LXX., too, renders it by Carthage. But this has already been assigned to Carshena, and could not be made use of again for the other ministers, who were all supposed to be sons of Cush, with the exception of Memucan. The explanation also of מֶרְסָנָה shows this. It is Maurusia, and the Greek name for Mauretania is to be understood by it. The Targum also explains רעמה (Gen. x. 7) by this word. The name Memucan is very artificially explained. Because the fate of Vashti was decided through him, therefore he is compared with Daniel, and is called Memucan, "the one who was appointed to this work." For the Hebrew מתקן, part, Mucan is usually reproduced in the Targum by חקן, hence מתקן=Mומוכן. This connecting of Memucan with Daniel is more remarkable than that which the Targum ascribes to Daniel, which does not redound to his honour. The explanations in Midrash Esther are quite different. Memucan is not there identified with Daniel. In the first Targum he is, on the contrary, compared with Haman (comp. Megill. p. 12b). Mordecai is explained by מראדכיא, "pure balm," in allusion to Ex. xxx. 23 (comp. Bab. Chulin 139b).

a proper one, they carried it into execution; but if not, the older ministers gave their advice. And as Memucan was the youngest of them all, he gave his advice first. It so happened that Memucan had married a Persian wife who was richer than himself, and she refused to speak to him in any other language but her own, and so he thought to himself, now is the opportunity to compel the wives to honour their husbands. Therefore he said to the king and the nobles: "Not against the king alone has Queen Vashti failed, but also against all the nations and governors that are in the empire of Ahhashverosh. For the answer of the queen will be spread among all the women who now honour their husbands, and every woman will say to her husband, 'Art thou perhaps worthier than King Ahhashverosh, who commanded that Queen Vashti should come before him, and she refused to come?' Even this day the noble women of Persia and Media repeat the language of the queen to the royal governors in such a manner that it causes contempt and occasion for wrath." But at the very time when Memucan gave this decision, he was anxious about himself. He thought, perhaps the king will not issue a decree, and Queen Vashti may hear of my advice concerning her, and she will judge me severely, and cause me to be killed. I will therefore see that the king should not order her to appear before him, by binding him by an oath which the Persians and Medes fear (to break). Hence he further said: "If it please the king, let this decree be issued, and this oath be written in the statute book of the Medes and Persians that it should not be invalidated, namely, that Vashti should no more come before the king, and that her kingdom should be given to her companion, who is better than she. And let this decision be proclaimed in all the empire, however great it may be, and all the women, great and small, will honour their husbands." This advice pleased the king and his governors, and he acted according to the words of Memucan. The king sent letters to all the provinces, to each according to its writing, and to every people in its own language, to the effect that every husband should be honoured in his house, and that he should speak his native tongue.

§ VII.

After these things, when the wrath of King Ahhashverosh was pacified, he sent and called his nobles, and said to them : “I am angry, not against Vashti, but against you ; I have spoken a word when drunk with wine, but why have you provoked me that I should kill Vashti, and blot out her name from the kingdom ? Now I shall also kill you, and blot out your names from the kingdom.” After the nobles were killed, Vashti was remembered, and that which was decreed concerning her, that she herself did not deserve punishment of death, but that it was so determined in heaven, in order that the posterity of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, should perish.

Then said the royal young men and servants : “Let fair young virgins be sought for the king, and let the king appoint officers and trustworthy men in all his dominion who should collect fair virgins and bring them to Shushan to the harem, and that Hega, the royal eunuch, be appointed to guard them and to provide for them. And the virgin that shall please the king shall reign in place of Vashti.” The king was pleased with these words, and he did so. There lived a Jewish man in the capital Shushan, and his name was Mordecai. But why was he called a Jewish man ? Because he feared to commit sin. Concerning him David prophesied when he said : “Shall there die on this day a man of Israel ?” And from that man descended the man Mordecai, son of Yair, son of Shimei, son of Shmida, son of Baanah, son of Elah, son of Micah, son of Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan, son of Saul, son of Kish, son of Abiel, son of Zeror, son of Becorath, son of Aphia, son of Shehharim, son of Uziah, son of Sheshak, son of Mica, son of Elyael, son of Amihud, son of Shephatyah, son of Pethuel, son of Pithon, son of Malich, son of Yerubaal, son of Yeruhham, son of Hhanayah, son of Zabdi, son of Elpaal, son of Shimri, son of Zechariah, son of Merimoth, son of Hhushim, son of Shehhorah, son of Gazah, son of Azah, son of Gera, son of Bela, son of Benjamin, son of Jacob, who was also called Israel. But why was Mordecai called the son of Shimei? For this reason. When Shimei despised David, king of Israel (on his flight), and said to him, "Go away, thou wicked man, who deservest to be slain!" then Abishai, son of Zeruyah, said to David, "I shall go and take off his head." But David saw prophetically that Mordecai would descend from him. And foreseeing this, he commanded his son Solomon that he should only then kill Shimei in case he would cease to beget a son who would be worthy to bring him to the world to come (he should spare him), because from him would come a righteous son, by whose instrumentality wonders would be done to Israel in four exiles; and this is Mordecai, i.e. pure myrrh, son of Yair, son of Shimei, son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin. But Shimei did indeed deserve punishment of death, as it is written in the law of Moses: "A righteous judge shalt thou not vex, and a prince of thy people shalt thou not curse." Yet David had pity on him and spared him, because he foresaw that two righteous persons would one day descend from him, through whom Israel would be delivered. Mordecai and Esther were from Jerusalem, and were banished into exile together with Jeconiah, king of Judah. Mordecai returned with those people who volunteered to go up and build the temple a second time, when Nebuchnadnezzar again banished him. Yet again in the country of the children of the exile he did not cease from doing wonderful and mighty works. Mordecai brought up Hadassah. This is Esther; and she was called Hadassah, because as the myrtle spreads fragrance in the world, so did she spread good works. And for this reason she was called in the Hebrew language Hadassah, because the righteous are likened to a myrtle. In reference to her Isaiah prophesied, saying: "Instead of the Naazuz (the thorn) shall come up the Berosh (fir-tree), and instead of the Sarpard (briar) shall come up an Hadassah." That is to say, instead of Naazuz, the thorn, shall grow up a tamarinth, i.e. instead of the pious Mordecai the wicked Haman shall ascend the scaffold. Sarpard is a willow;¹ instead of the willow shall grow up the myrtle, i.e. instead of Vashti, Esther shall ascend the throne.

For the sake of this Esther, Mordecai went into exile. He said: "I will rather go into exile and educate Esther than remain in the land of Israel." She was called Esther, because she was like the planet Venus, which is called in Greek Astara. But her name Hadassah was on account of her piety, for the righteous are called so, like Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, of whom it is said: "And he stood among the myrtle trees that were in the captivity" (R. V. "bottom" or "shady place") (Zech. i. 8). And Zula, "bottom," "shady place," is Babylon, for thus it is written, "that saith to the deep, Be dry"² (Isa. xliv. 27). She was also called Hadassah, because as the myrtle does not dry up either in summer or in winter, so the righteous have a share in this world and in the world to come. This Esther was the daughter of Mordecai's father's brother; she remained the same in her youth and in her old age, and never ceased from doing good. She had neither father nor mother, was fair in appearance and graceful in figure, and when her father and mother died, Mordecai adopted her as his daughter.

² The explanation that צֹלָה is Babylon, is a figurative rather than a verbal one. They took this idea from the context of the above passage, which speaks of Cyrus as the deliverer. With the word צֹלָה they identified מצולָה of Zech. i. 8 [see also D. Kimchi, in loco. — TRANS.], where myrtle trees are spoken of, and hence the Targum applied it to Esther, who came from Babylon. In reference to the meaning of the word צֹלָה, it is generally in modern times translated by "the bottom," "the deep," which meaning is to my mind an improbable one. It surely refers to the wonderful conquest of Babylon by Cyrus, when he dried up the inundation which protected it, as Vitringa already has inferred this from Herodotus and Xenophon. צֹלָה cannot mean anything else but "water," "sea," and is connected with θαλ(ασσα). R. Moses ha Cohen (quoted by Ibn Ezra on Zechariah) considered the word מצולָה as equivalent to בריכת מים, "a pool of water."

Now when the royal decrees were made known, and virgins were gathered to Shushan through Hega the royal eunuch and keeper of the women, and when Mordecai heard that virgins were forcibly demanded, he took Esther and withdrew her from the royal messengers, that they should not carry her away. He hid her in a summer-house, that they should not see her. The daughters of the heathen used to dance and show their beauty through the windows when the royal messengers passed by, therefore the messengers brought many virgins from the provinces. And the messengers knew Esther, and when they saw that she was not among these virgins, they said one to another: "In vain have we exerted ourselves to bring virgins from the provinces, when we have in our province a virgin who surpasses in beauty all those whom we have brought." And when search was made for Esther and she was not found, they made it known to the king. When the king heard it, he issued an order¹ that every virgin who shall conceal herself from the royal messengers, shall be punished with death. Mordecai, hearing this order, was afraid, and he conducted his uncle's daughter to the market, and so Esther was brought by Hega, the keeper of the women, unto the king. And the girl pleased him, and was by him rewarded with favours; he was zealous in giving her presents of ornaments and portions, likewise seven virgins were appointed for her from the royal house. Yet she gave her portions away to the heathen virgins, because she did not want to taste of the wine which came from the house of the king. He distinguished her as the best of all the women. Esther did not tell who her people or her family were, for Mordecai had commanded her not to tell. Day by day Mordecai passed by the seraglio, in order to learn how Esther fared, and what wonderful things were accomplished through her. Now when the time had come that these virgins should appear before King Ahhashverosh, for according to the custom the women had to remain twelve months, of which six months were spent in using unguents and oil of myrrh, and six months in using spices and other female preparations. Then the girl came before the king, and whatever she wished to take from the harem to the king's house was given her. In the evening she went there, and in the morning she returned to the harem, accompanied by Shaashgaz, the royal eunuch and keeper of the women. Her name was inscribed in a book, and she could not come again to the king unless he wanted her, and called her by her name. But when the time had arrived that Esther, the daughter of Abihayil, Mordecai's uncle—who had in truth brought her up like his own daughter—had to appear before the king, she did not ask for anything but what Hega, the royal eunuch, wished her to have; and Esther found favour in the eyes of all who saw her. Esther was then led to the King Ahhashverosh into the royal palace, in the tenth month, the month Tebeth, in the seventh year of his reign. And the king loved Esther more than all the wives, and she was rewarded by him with more grace and favour than all the virgins; and he caused her to reign in the place of Vashti. The king made a great feast, the feast of Esther, for all his lords and statesmen, and distributed many presents in the provinces. On the occasion, he said to her: "Pray tell me, who are thy people, and what is thy family?" She replied: "I am ignorant both concerning my people and concerning my family, because when I was quite a child, my father and mother died and left me." Now when the king heard these words, he universally remitted the taxes, and gave presents to the provinces, because he thought and said to himself, I will do good to all the nations and governments, among whom is certainly the people of Esther.

When the virgins were again gathered, and this second gathering was only because Esther was living in the palace of the king, and he loved her more than all the wives, and had put the royal crown upon her head. Yes, the second gathering was, because the governors said to the king : " If thou wilt that Esther should reveal to thee her nation and family, cause her to be jealous by gathering other women, and then she will reveal both." So the virgins were gathered a second time, and, just then, Mordecai sat at the royal gate. Nevertheless, Esther did not tell concerning her people and her origin, but was doing just what Mordecai commanded her; for as she was modest in her youth, so she remained even when she became queen. Therefore Scripture says : " Esther did the commandment of Mordecai, like as when she was brought up with him."

In those days when Mordecai sat at the gates of the royal house, Bigthan and Teresh, two of the royal eunuchs and keepers of the wardrobe, were wroth, and wanted to lay violent hands upon and to kill King Ahhashverosh, having devised a plan of putting a poisonous snake¹ in the golden cup from which Ahhashverosh drank, in order that it might bite and kill him. This affair was revealed to Mordecai by the Holy Spirit, and he told it to Esther, who communicated to the king in Mordecai's name. The matter was investigated and found true, and they were both hanged on a scaffold; and the event was recorded in the chronicle of the king.

§ VIII.

After these events, King Ahhashverosh promoted Haman,²

² The genealogy of Haman is most interesting, because it enumerates all the enemies and oppressors of the Jews who have oppressed them in the Holy Land. It discloses impressions which date from before the destruction of Jerusalem. It is not indeed very easy to restore the son of Hamdatha the Agagite, son of Stench, son of Robbery, son of Pilate, son of Lysius, son of Florus, son of Fadus, son of Flaccus, son of Antipater, son of Herod, son of Refuse, son of Decay, son of Parmashta, son of Vajasatha, son of Agag, son of the Red, son of Amalek, son of the concubine of Eliphaz, the eldest son of Esau. He made him great, and placed him upon a throne higher than all his nobles and ministers. And all the servants of the king who sat at the gate of the royal palace bowed down and prostrated themselves before Haman, because the king had commanded it; but Mordecai did not kneel before him, nor salute him. Then the servants of the king who sat at the gate of the royal palace said to Mordecai: "What privilege hast thou above us, that we should make obeisance before Haman, and that thou shouldst not kneel before him? Why dost thou transgress the command of the king?" Mordecai answered and said to them: "You are foolish, and without understanding! Hear me, and tell me, you hypocrites (or coal blacks), Where is there a man who dares to be so proud and haughty? He a man born of a woman, and his duration but a few days! He who at his birth weeps and cries, corrupted names, yet the whole underlying thought supports and confirms the emendation. Instead of אַפְלָטוֹן must be read פָּלָטוֹן, Pilatus the governor, who was not the less hated by the Jews when he assumed the fatal position in the history of Christ. Instead of רִיזֶס (פְּלָסִים) be placed (Joseph. Ant. xii. 7. 3 ; 1 Macc. chap. iii.), the remarkable and cruel brother of Pallus. Instead of פָּרוֹס is to be read פָּלוֹן, Florus. Under Gessius Florus broke out the Jewish war (Joseph. Ant. xx. 10. 11). For מָעֵד is to be read פָּעֵד, Fadus the procurator of Judea under Claudius (Joseph. Ant. xx. 1. 1, etc.). For בְּלָעֵק is to be read פְּלָעֵק, Flaccus the governor of Syria (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6. 2). For אַנְטִימָרוֹס is to be read אַנְטִיפָּטוֹרָס, Antipater, as this clearly appears from his being connected with Herod. Agag is called בָּר סֻמְקִי, the son of the red, viz. Rufus. The name Rufus was not merely the name of the enemy in the Jewish war, but it is a translation of Edom, Esau himself. Rome was understood to be a successor to Edom (comp. my Chazar. Königsbrief, Berlin 1876, p. 53). בר שָׁנָר means a young calf, and refers to Vitellius. בר נָגָר refers to Cestius Gallus, for נָגָר means a cock (תָּרָא, cock of the wood). With respect to the meaning of the names of Haman's sons, see the commentary.

in his youth mourns and sighs, and during all his days is full of trouble and vexation, and at last returns to his dust : And shall I kneel before him ? Never ! I only bow before the one great and living God in heaven, who is a consuming fire and whose angels are fire, who holds the earth in His arm, who spread out the heavens by His mighty power, who by His will makes the sun to be darkness and the darkness to be light, who by His wisdom surrounded the ocean with sand, provided the sea with odorous salt and with banks, keeping the waves bound in the deep as with chains that they should not overflow the land and not pass their limit. By His word He created the firmament and spread it as a cloud in the air, yea, He spread it as a vapour upon the world, and a tent upon the surface of the earth, and by His power He carries the things that are above and below. Before Him the sun, the moon, and the Pleiades run their course, and the stars and planets are not for a moment inactive. None of them rest, but all run before Him as His messengers, who go right and left to do His will. To Him who created them belongs praise, and before Him one must bow.” They replied to Mordecai : “ Nevertheless, one of thy fathers bowed before one of the fathers of Haman ! ” “ Who was it,” exclaimed Mordecai, “ who bowed before the ancestor of Haman ? ” They rejoined : “ Was it not thy father Jacob who bowed before his brother Esau, the ancestor of Haman ? ” He in reply said, “ I am of the posterity of Benjamin,¹ and when Jacob bowed before Esau,

Benjamin was not yet born, and he never in all his life bowed before a man. Hence an eternal covenant was made with him while he was yet in his mother's womb, until the time that Israel shall go up to their land and build the temple in his territory, and that the Shechinah shall dwell in his border, and that all Israel shall rejoice there, and that the nations shall bow and prostrate themselves in his land. But I shall not bow before the wicked Haman, this enemy!"

Day by day they thus spake to him, and he did not hearken to them. They then reported him to Haman, to see whether the words of Mordecai will stand, in that he told them that he was a Jew. When Haman saw that Mordecai refused to bow before him, he was full of wrath against him.—But he was too despicable an object in his eyes to lay violent hands on him alone, and he wanted rather to destroy all those Jews who were sojourning in the empire of Ahhashverosh. In the first month, which is the month Nisan, in the twelfth year of the reign of Ahhashverosh, he cast the lot, in order to destroy the holy people. Then an echoing voice from heaven resounded, and said: "Fear not, congregation of Israel! If you turn with repentance to God, then the lot will fall upon him instead of thee." The scribe Shamshai began to cast the lot before Haman day by day. He began on the first day of the week, but did not succeed, because on that day were the heavens and the earth created. The second day was likewise unpropitious, because on it the firmament was created. He failed on the third day, because on it the garden of Eden was created. The fourth day was unfavourable to him, because on it were created the sun, the moon, the seven stars, and the twelve planets. The

was a jasper (Heb. יְשָׁפֵחַ), which was interpreted as composed of two words יְשׁ פָּה, "he had a mouth," and yet he was silent (Midrash Esther 92b; comp. R. Behhai on Yalkut Reubeni 104c). From this etymology plainly comes that which Pliny observes (lib. 37, § 118): "Libet obiter sanitatem magicam hic quoque coarguere, quoniam hanc utillem esse concionantibus prodiderunt."

fifth day¹ did not serve his purpose, because on it were created the leviathan and the cock of the wood, which have been appointed for a feast to the congregation of Israel on the great day.

The sixth day was unfavourable, because on it Adam and Eve were created; and likewise the seventh day, because it is a covenant between the word of the Lord and the people of Israel. He then left the days and began with the months.

¹ The legend of the leviathan and cock of the wood being created on the fifth day, in order that Israel should feast on them on the great day (יום רבא), is very remarkable, and betrays Christian influence. In Gen. i. 21 we read that on the fifth day were created the ocean monsters (תנינים). The Targum Yerushalmi adds, that the leviathan was also created on the fifth day for the purpose of serving a feast on the great day. But no mention is made of the cock of the wood (רָנֶן בָּרָא). The passages which are generally adduced from the O. T. for the great feast, viz. Isa. xxvii. 1, Job xl. 26, etc., do not give in the slightest way any information concerning a banquet of leviathan and the cock of the wood. The passage here is to be understood as a contrast to Christian symbolism. The leviathan is the opposite of ichthys [fish], which is the emblem of Christ, and contains the acrostic of His name. Joshua (שׁוֹעַ), the conqueror of Canaan, was also the son of Nun, which means fish. On the fifth day—on Thursday, which is called the great fifth ($\mu\sigma\gamma\alpha\lambda\eta\pi\epsilon\mu\pi\tau\eta$)—Christ constituted the Lord's Supper, when He said, “Take, eat, this is my body.” The idea of the feast of the leviathan was started as a counterpart to the supper of the ichthys. That this is really so, is seen from the addition of the בָּרָא, which is only found in this place. The cock of the wood, or “wild cock,” stands for the cock in general. It is well known that the Jews have on the eve of the Day of Atonement a cock for every male as an atonement, when they say: “This is my substitution, this is my vicarious sacrifice, this is my atonement, this cock shall go to death, and I shall enter into life.” That this act is vicarious may be seen from the fact that the cock is called Geber, i.e. “man,” and has special reference to Christ, who is called Geber in Zech. xiii. 7. Certainly most Jews are not acquainted with the fact that these Christian ideas are contained in that ceremony; but learned Jews have perceived the hidden meaning, and have consequently discouraged the use of the ceremony altogether. It is remarkable that it was customary to use a fish for the same purpose, in case a cock was wanting. It had the same symbolism. Julius Africanus says also: “Christ is the fish who nourishes the world.” Upon pictures of the Lord's Supper are found a fish instead of a lamb on the dish. It is likewise the custom among the Jews to have fish and cock in their Sabbath meals. The feast of the leviathan represented the same as that of the cock. The Targumist unites the two, in order to indicate that the feast will consist of fish and meat. Concerning the symbolism of the fish, see my Eddischen Studien pp. 118–121.

Nisan was not appropriate, because of the meritorious influence of the feast of the Passover. Nor Iyar, because during this month fell the manna. Nor Sivan, because in it was the Law given on Mount Sinai. Nor Tamuz, because in it were the walls of Jerusalem broken, and two evils cannot take place in the same month. Nor Ab,¹ because in it the Israelites in the desert ceased from dying away, and the Shechinah of the Lord of the universe began again to speak with Moses. Nor Elul, because in it Moses went up on Mount Sinai to bring down the second tables. Nor Tishri, because in it the sins of Israel are forgiven. Nor Marheshvan, because the flood ceased in the same month, when Noah and all his were saved. Nor Kislev, because in it was laid the foundation of the temple. Nor Tebeth, because in it the wicked Nebuchadnezzar went up against Jerusalem, and this tribulation was sufficient. Nor Shebat, because this month is the new year for the trees, of which the first-fruits are offered. When he finally came to the twelfth month, the month Adar, he said : "Now they are caught by my hands like the fish of the sea." But he did not know that the children of Joseph are likened to fish, as it is written : "They shall multiply like the fish of the sea, among men upon the earth."

And Haman spake to King Ahhashverosh : "There is a certain people of the Jews, scattered and thrown about among the nations in all the provinces of the empire ; they are proud and haughty, they bathe in Tebeth in tepid water, and in Tamuz they sit in cold baths. They practise laws and customs which are different from those of every other nation and country, and do not walk according to our laws, nor have pleasure in our customs, nor do they serve the king. When they see us they spit on the ground, and consider us in the light of an unclean thing. When we go to them and order them to do some service to the king, then they jump down the walls, break down the fences, and make their escape through the gaps. When we try to catch them, they turn round and stand staring at us, gnash with their teeth, stamp with their feet, and so frighten us that we are not able to take hold of them. We do not marry their daughters, and they do not marry ours. Is any of them taken for the service of the king, he passes the day in idleness, with all kinds of excuses, such as to-day is the Sabbath, to-day is Passover. The day on which they want to buy from us they call a lawful day, and the day on which we want to buy something from them they call an unlawful day, and they close the market for us. In the first hour of the day they say, 'We must read the Shema' (Deut. vi. 4); in the second hour they say, 'We must pray;' in the third, 'We must eat;' in the fourth they say, 'We must thank the God of heaven for having given us bread and water.' In the fifth they go out for a walk. In the sixth they come back. In the seventh they go to meet their wives, who say to them, 'Here is some soup to refresh you after the heavy toil which the tyrannical king put on you.' One day in the week they keep as a day of rest, in which they go to their synagogues, read in their books, interpret their prophets, curse our king, imprecate our rulers, and say: 'This is the seventh day, in which the great God rested.'

"Their unclean wives go after seven days, in the middle of the night, and defile the water. On the eighth day they circumcise their sons, without any pity upon them, in order, as they say, thereby to differ from other nations. Thirty days they call a month, and they say one month is complete and another is defective. In the month of Nisan they keep a feast, lasting eight days, when they remove and burn everything that is leaven, and cleanse their utensils, and say, 'This is the day in which our fathers were redeemed from Egypt;' and they call this day Passover, and go to their synagogues, read their books, interpret their prophets, curse the king, imprecate the governors, and say, 'Like the leaven is removed from that which is unleavened, so may the kingdom of the tyrant be removed from among us, and so may we be delivered from this foolish king.' In the month Sivan they keep a feast of two days, in which they go into their synagogues, read the Shema, pray, read their law, interpret their prophets, curse the king, imprecate the governors, and call it the day of convocation.¹ They then go up to the roof of the house of their God, and throw down pomegranates and apples, and then collect them, and say, 'Like as we gather these pomegranates and apples, so may their sons be gathered out from amongst us.' They also say, 'This is the day in which the Law was given to our fathers on Mount Sinai.' A certain time they call new year, viz. the first of Tishri, in which they go to their synagogues, read their books, interpret their prophets, curse the king, imprecate the governors, blow the trumpets, and say, 'On this day the remembrance of our fathers comes up before our Father in heaven. May our remembrance conduce to our good, and that of our enemies conduce to their evil.' On the ninth of the same month they slaughter geese and animals, eat and drink sumptuously—they, their wives, their sons, and their daughters. The tenth of this month they call a great fast day, on which they, their wives, and their sons and daughters fast; and they harass even their children and sucklings, without pity upon them, and they say, 'On this day are our sins atoned, yea, our sins are collected and added to the sins of our enemies.' They go to their synagogues, read their books, interpret their prophets, curse the king, imprecate the governors, and say, 'May this foolish kingdom be blotted out from the world;' and they pray and supplicate that the king may die, and that his government may be destroyed. On the fifteenth day of the same month they erect booths on the roofs of their houses, then they go into our orchards, cut down our palm leaves, pluck down our citrons, break our willows (or spice trees), destroy our gardens and our fences without any pity, and then they make of the branches hosannas,¹ and say, ‘As the king does among the arrayed army, so do we.’ Then they go to their synagogues, read their books, pray, rejoice, go around with their hosannas, jump and dance like goats, and we do not know whether they curse or bless us. They call this feast the Feast of Tabernacles, and do not perform the work of the king, saying to us, ‘This is a forbidden day.’ Thus they spend the year, with the excuse of ‘Sheehy, Pheehy,’ i.e. ‘To-day is a Sabbath, to-day is a feast.’²

² The speech of Haman before the king, as given by the Targum, is very remarkable. It vividly describes the accusations which were brought against the Jews in the time of the Targumist, and which are still brought against them by their enemies. Whatever they did is taken amiss. They are represented to live extravagantly, because, forsooth, they bathe in the summer in cold, and in the winter in tepid water. They are reproached for feeding upon roast geese before the fast day. They are further reproached that they have no relish for the service of the king, that they hate other nations, curse the kings, and that they continually have holidays as an excuse for not doing loyal service to the government. We must remark upon some of the items of this speech, because they are not without historical interest. It is said twice that they spent their time with שְׁהִ פָּהִ instead of doing some useful service. The same expression is found in Bab. Megilla 13b דְּמַפְּקָא לְבוֹלָא שְׁתָא בְּשָׁהִי (בְּפָהִ). Rashi explains the words as initial letters of פָּסָח הַיּוֹם שְׁבָת הַיּוֹם, as if they always excused themselves with the saying, “To-day is Sabbath, to-day is Passover.” Though this explanation is given above, yet I do not agree with it. Levy in Chald. Lex., voce בְּפָהִ, says that Rashi’s explanation is forced. I now think it an impossible one. First, because the feast of the Passover happens only once in the year, and they could not excuse themselves the whole year round by saying: “To-day is Passover.” Secondly, such an acrostic abbreviation may look well to the eye, but sounds badly to the ear. It is plainly an alliterative formula, expressing “doing nothing,” or “doing useless things,” as we have in

“Fifty years they call a jubilee; seven years, a jubilee week; twelve months, a year; thirty days, a month; the seventh day they call a day of rest, and they keep it as a feast day, in which the Lord of the universe rested. When their kingdom was yet standing, there arose a king among them whose name was David, who harboured thoughts of evil against us, and wished to kill us and to exterminate us from the world. Two parts of us he killed and rooted out, and one part he left. Yet of those he left he made servants. As it is written: ‘And he measured them with the line, making them to lie down on the ground’ (2 Sam. viii. 2). After him rose up one of the kings who were thy predecessors; his name was Nebuchadnezzar, and he went against them, destroyed their temple, plundered their city, and led them into captivity, and still they are high-spirited and have not given up their haughtiness till now, but say: ‘We are the children of renowned fathers, and we have never subjected ourselves nor bowed to kings, neither have we obeyed governors.’ They send letters to every place, asking for prayers to God that the king may die, and that our rule may be destroyed; and this they do without our knowledge. When their forefathers came down to Egypt they were only seventy persons, but when they went up (out of Egypt) they were sixty myriads. And even now, though they are likewise in captivity, and have nothing, yet they say: ‘We are the children of pious and good people.’ But, in fact, there is not a more poor and faulty people in the world than they are. This people is in all the towns; some of them are dealers in wax¹ and candle provisioners, and some

Gernian Larifari and Schnickschnack, and in English shilly-shally and helter-skelter. I remark, in passing, that Larifari comes from the Greek λῆπος, which Grimm and others have overlooked. The Romans said butu batta. It is, moreover, interesting to note that such meaningless alliterations, like Phehy, generally begin with F, thus: Foxen, flocus, flyaros, larifari, and therefore Shehy, Phehy, may mean useless words in reference to Pe, month.

of them are great men. Everything they sell, they sell at an overcharged price, and everything they buy, they do not pay its value; they do not observe the laws and ordinances of the king, and the king has no advantage in tolerating them or in allowing them to exist.

"If it please the king, let him write an order for their extermination, and I will give thee for every one of them a hundred zuzin; and as the total number of their ancestors when they went out from Egypt was six hundred thousand men, and ten thousand kikar silver are equal to six hundred thousand zuzin, so if it please the king I will deliver this money from my treasury into thy treasury. It needs only a stroke of the pen, and the silver in full weight shall be delivered through the officers of the mint into the treasury of the king." Then the king of kings answered and said: "They have long ago paid a sela (half a shekel) per head, when they went out of Egypt, and the sum amounted to one hundred kikar, and one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven selas. Thou hast therefore no right to sell them, nor has Ahhashverosh a right to buy them." Then the king took off his ring from his hand and gave it to Haman, son of Hamdatha the was to make the Jews appear contemptible. He represents them on the one hand as poor miserable people, who maintain themselves as dealers in a small way, and on the other hand as usurers. The trade in wax, קירא (cera), did not bring large profits. The Jews were in the habit of using many wax candles in their service in the synagogue as well as at home, especially on the Day of Atonement; and the singling out of this trade seems to be a mocking allusion to it. This is seen in Sanhed. 95a: "Thy grandson buys wax, and art not thou sorry?" In the Minhagim of the year 1692 (Dyhernfurt), p. 38, we read: "On the eve of the Day of Atonement it is necessary to light a candle, for the candle atones (מכפר) for the soul (נפשה), which is also a candle. It is also an honour for the synagogues to have many candles." A curious story is told that in אַשְׁכָנָן, Germany, candles were only lighted for men and not for women. The man has 258 members in his body; add to this his soul and spirit, רוח and נשמה, the initials of which are נר, candle, and numerically also 250. In other countries, candles are lighted for the women also, though they have four members more in their bodies than the men. As גּוֹבִינִי קִירָא, "buyers of wax," and חַלְעַן בּוֹצֵן, "those who hang up candles," are connected together, so in the usage of the Byzantine Church οὐρανοὶ and ἡλικυῖαι stand together.

Agagite, the oppressor of the Jews. And the king said to Haman: "The money is given to thee, and the people too, to do with them as it seems best in thy sight."

But thou, Ahhashverosh, hast neither acted like a buyer nor like a seller, for a buyer gives money and a seller takes money; but thou hast given thy ring to Haman, and hast said to him: "Thy money is given thee and the people, to do with them as it seems best in thy sight." In thee is the verse verified which says: "As a ring of gold in a swine's snout (Prov. xi. 22). As rings do not befit swine, so the kingdom does not befit thee, and thou art like a beautiful woman of bad morals."

Then the scribes of the king were called together on the thirteenth day of the month Nisan, and everything which Haman commanded concerning the Jews was written down, for all the dignitaries of the king, and for all the great men in every province, and for the rulers of every people. In the writing and language of each country and people it was written in the name of King Ahhashverosh and sealed with the royal seal. And letters were sent by swift messengers to all the provinces of the king to destroy, to kill, and to exterminate all the Jews, from boys to old men, infants and women in one day, namely, on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, the month Adar, and also to plunder their houses. The writing was explained, and its object was revealed and published to all the nations in every province, that they should be prepared for that day. All this happened that thou (reader) mayest know that God never fails to punish with measure for measure. You have seen that because the brethren of Joseph sold him into a strange land, therefore their descendants were likewise sold into a strange land; but as Benjamin did not take part in this transaction with his brethren, for that reason two of his descendants, viz. Mordecai and Esther, became redeemers of Israel. The swift messengers hastened on with the decree of the king, and it was also published in the capital Shushan, while the king and Haman sat down to eat and to drink, and the city of Shushan was in a state of lamentation.

And Mordecai, the righteous, saw by the Holy Spirit everything that had been done, viz. that the king had sent word from his palace by his servants to the righteous Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachai, who were in the chamber of hewn stones, and were prophesying on the great wall of Jerusalem, that they should stop the work of building after seventy-two towers were already built. The wicked Ahhashverosh also fetched a hundred and twenty-seven scribes from a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, every one of whom had a roll and a book in his hand. They sat at the gates of Shushan and wrote, and sent out grievous decrees concerning the Jews and their laws. The first letter written in the name of the king, and sealed with his signet-ring, they despatched by swift messengers, and the contents were as follows:—"From me, King Ahhashverosh, to all peoples, nations, and languages who live in all the land, peace be multiplied. I make known to you, that a certain man came to us, who is not from our place nor from our province, and he came for the purpose of joining us, that we might prevail against our enemies. We have made investigation concerning him, and (we find) that his name is Haman, son of King Agag, son of the great Amalek, son of Reuel, son of Eliphaz the first-born of Esau, in fact, a descendant of prominent lords and wealthy people. This man asked of me a small and insignificant petition, and informed me concerning the Jews and their blameworthy laws and affairs. He said, 'When they came out from Egypt they numbered six hundred thousand men, and so I will give thee six hundred thousand minas¹ of silver, a mina for every man ;' for which sum he desired that I should sell this people to him to be killed. Then I, Ahhashverosh, greatly rejoiced, and after mature deliberation, I took the money from him and sold the people to him to be slaughtered. Therefore, eat and drink and be merry, as I eat and drink and am merry. He that understands to handle the bow, let him use the bow ; and he that can fight with the sword, let him seize the sword, and go you out and overpower them on the fourteenth and fifteenth days of the month, which is called in our language Adar. Do not spare either their princes, their rulers, their great men, nor even their little children, but kill them and spoil their goods. I, King Ahhashverosh, do therefore hereby decree for all nations, languages, places, provinces, and for every tribe and family and town, that wherever a Jewish man-servant or a Jewish maid-servant is found, their masters shall slay them at the gate of the city, because they have not obeyed the order of the king which was issued by me, that no Jews should be found upon the soil of my empire."

And when Mordecai, the righteous, heard of the decree which was issued, and of the letters which were sealed, he rent his garments in the front and behind, and put on sackcloth and rolled himself in ashes, and lifted up his voice and cried, "Woe ! how great is this decree which the king and Haman have decreed against us ! Not a half of us has he condemned and a half spared, no not even a third or a fourth part has he spared, but the king and Haman have determined that we should all as a body be killed, destroyed, and rooted out." Now, when the people of Israel saw the righteous Mordecai, who was a greatly esteemed Rab¹ over them, they assembled together and came to him in very large multitudes. Then Mordecai stood up in the midst of the assembly and addressed them as follows : "People of

Israel, beloved and dear to the Father in heaven ! Do you not know, and have you not heard, that the king and Haman have determined to destroy us from off the face of the earth, and to exterminate us from under heaven ? Alas ! we have no king on whom we can rely, nor a prophet who should pray for us, nor a place into which we can flee, nor a country where we would be safe, for to every place it was written, and to every province a message was sent concerning us ! We are like sheep without a shepherd, and like a ship without a pilot. Yea, we are like orphans without a father, and like sucking babes whose mother has died." Immediately the holy ark was brought out to the gates of Shushan, and the book of the Law was taken out, and they covered it with sackcloth, and ashes spread upon it, and then they read therein : " When thou art in tribulation, and all these things have come upon thee, etc., thou should turn to the Lord thy God ; for the Lord thy God is a merciful God " (Deut. iv. 30, 31). Mordecai again rose in the midst of the congregation and said : " People of Israel ! Beloved and dear people ! Beloved and precious to God ! Let us look for an example to the people of Nineveh ! When the prophet Jonah, the son of Amitai, was sent to announce to them that the city of Nineveh would be destroyed, and when the tidings reached the king of Nineveh, he arose from his throne, laid aside the royal throne, put on sackcloth, rolled himself in ashes, and issued a proclamation in Nineveh, saying : ' The decree of the king and his nobles commands thus : Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste anything ; let them not feed nor drink water. Let them turn from their evil ways, and from the violence that is in their hands.' ' And the Lord turned by His word from the evil which He thought He would do unto them, and He did it not.' Let us also do as they did, and institute and proclaim fasts, because we are banished from Jerusalem ; and because of Israel's guilt, an echoing voice called upon wicked Nebuchadnezzar, and said : ' Nebuchadnezzar, king of Chaldea ! Arise and go against Jerusalem, and destroy it, and burn the temple with fire!' At that time Nebuchadnezzar shook his head and wrung his hands, knowing well what was the fate of Sennacherib's army, when an angel was sent down from heaven who killed eighteen myriads and five thousand of them, so that none remained alive but he himself." While Mordecai was thus speaking, he rent his garments, put on sackcloth, sat down in the dust, rolled himself in ashes, and burst into tears, and cried: "Woe to you, O house of Israel, that such a decree has been issued against you!" He then went into the city and cried loudly and bitterly. Then he went to the gate of the royal palace, because there was a decree which ordered that no man should come to the gate of the house of the king clothed in sackcloth. When, now, an Israelite came to a heathen and said to him: "I pray thee, let me and my wife and children be thy slaves, only that we may be delivered from being killed," then the heathen answered: "Seest thou not what is written in the decree which King Ahhashverosh has published, that if a Jew is found with any of our people, that man shall be killed like him?" Whereupon the Jew went home in great distress. At this time was verified that which is written in the law of Moses concerning Israel: "Ye shall sell yourselves unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you" (Deut. xxviii. 68). Day by day every one of them went and read the published royal decree, and then he knew how long he had yet to live in the world. Thus again was realized what is written in the law of Moses: "And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear night and day, and shalt have none assurance of thy life; in the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning! for the fear of thine heart which thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see" (Deut. xxviii. 66, 67).

In every place and province where the king's decree came, there was great lamentation amongst the Jews, consisting of

And Esther's maidens and her chamberlains came and told it her; and the queen was exceedingly grieved, and she sent raiment to clothe Mordecai, and to take his sackcloth from off him, but he received it not. Then called Esther for Hathach, one of the king's chamberlains, whom he had appointed to attend upon her, to charge him to go to Mordecai, to know what this was, and why it was. So Hathach went forth to Mordecai, unto the broad place of the city, which was before the king's gate. And Mordecai told him of all that had happened unto him, and the exact sum of the money that Haman had promised to pay by weight to the king's treasuries for the Jews to destroy them. And he gave him an explicit copy of the writing of the decree that was published in Shushan, to destroy them, to show it unto Esther, and to declare it unto her; and to charge her that she should go in unto the king, to make supplication unto him, and to make request before him for her people. And Hathach came and told Esther the words of Mordecai. Then Esther spake unto Hathach,¹ and charged him to say to Mordecai: "All the king's servants, and the people of the king's provinces, do know that whosoever, whether man or woman, shall come unto the king into the inner court who is not called, there is one law for him, that he be put to death, except such as to whom the king shall hold out the golden sceptre, that he may live. And behold, I have been praying for thirty days, that the king should not ask for me and cause me to sin; for as I was trained by thee, thou didst say to me, that every woman of the daughters of Israel who of her own free will co-habits with a heathen, has no part among the tribes of Israel."

And because Hathach was a messenger between Esther and Mordecai, Haman was very wroth against him, and killed him. The words of Esther were then reported by writing to

Mordecai. And Mordecai said in reply to Esther as follows : " Perhaps thou imaginest that thou at any rate art safe, and sayest to thyself, I need not pray for Israel ; but when only a foot of one Jew is struck, do not think that thou, of all Jews, shalt escape. For thy ancestor Saul caused this evil to Israel, because if he had done what the prophet Samuel told him, then the tyrant Haman would not have sprung from the children of the house of Amalek ; and if he had killed King Agag, this son of Hamdatha would never have risen against us, and would never have sold us for ten thousand kikar of silver to King Ahhashverosh, and the Holy One, blessed be He ! would not have delivered Israel into the hands of two tyrants. Nor, at the beginning (of our history) would Amalek, the ancestor of Haman, have come against Israel and carried on war against Joshua, son of Nun, at Rephidim, though, through the prayer of Moses, the memory of Amalek was blotted out from the world. Arise, therefore, and pray to thy heavenly Father for the people of Israel. He who did justice to the first generation will also do justice to those who came after them. Is, then, Haman the tyrant stronger than another ? Or is his decree of greater duration ? Is he stronger than his ancestor Amalek, who came against Israel, but whom the Lord removed from the world ? Is he stronger than those thirty-one kings who likewise came against Israel, but against whom Joshua, instructed by a word from heaven, went and killed them ? Is he stronger than Sisera, who came against Israel with nine hundred iron chariots, and closed the cisterns against them, in order that their wives should not bathe, . . . that they should not multiply and increase in the world, but whom God delivered into the hand of a woman, and she killed him ? Is, indeed, this wicked Haman stronger than Goliath, who came and blasphemed the armies of Israel, but who was delivered into the hands of David, and he killed him ? Is he stronger than the sons of Orphah, who came and carried on war against Israel, but who were delivered into the hands of David and of his servants, and they killed them. Therefore withhold not thy mouth from prayer, nor thy lips from interceding for mercy from thy Creator. And pray that, for the sake of the righteousness of our fathers' Israel, we may be delivered from slaughter; and He who has at all times done wonders for them will also deliver our enemies into our hands, and we shall do with them as we please. But, O Esther, do not fancy that thou, of all the Jews, shalt be saved in the house of the king. For if thou neglectest thy opportunity at this time, He who is the Holy One, and the Redeemer of the Jews at all times, will cause redemption to spring up for them from another place, but thou and thy father's house shall perish. And who knows whether thou hast not come to the kingdom because the sins of thy father's house are called to account."

Then Esther answered Mordecai by letter: "Go gather together all the Jews that are found in Shushan, and fast for me, and neither eat nor drink three days and three nights; and I also and my maidens will fast in like manner, and so will I go in unto the king without being summoned; and if I perish in this world for your sake, I shall have a portion in the world to come. Hitherto I went to the king against my will, but now I go willingly. And a daughter of Israel who is violated by a Gentile is a lawful wife to her husband. Let the bridegroom go out from his sleeping-room covered with sackcloth, and let the bride likewise leave her nuptial chamber with her head covered with ashes. Let men and beasts and sheep not taste anything for three days, and let the babes be separated from the breasts of their mothers."

Immediately they inspected the assembly, and they found in it twelve thousand young priests. These seized trumpets with their right hand and the books of the law with their left, and then wept and cried towards heaven, and said: "O God of Israel! behold the law which Thou hast given us. Behold, Thy beloved people is about to cease from the world. Who will read therein and speak of Thy name? The sun and moon will be dark, and not give their light, for they were created but for Thy people Israel." They then fell upon their faces, and cried : “ Answer us, O Father, answer us ! Answer us, O King, answer us ! ” And they blew the trumpets, and the people cried aloud after them, so that the hosts of heaven wept, and the patriarchs were moved in their graves.

Mordecai went and did everything which Esther charged him to do. And it was on the third day, after Esther had three successive fasts, she arose from the earth where she was sitting, bowed down in dust and ashes, not having changed her raiment, and she put on royal apparel, which was embroidered with gold of Ophir, adorned herself with a fine silk dress wrought with diamonds and pearls that were brought from Africa,¹ and put the golden crown upon her head, and shoes of pure refined gold² upon her feet. After this she prayed thus : “ O Thou who art the great God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, and the God of my father Benjamin, it was not because I was right before Thee that I came to this foolish king, but for the sake of Thy people Israel, that they should not perish from the world. For the sake of Israel the whole world was created, and if Israel should perish from the world, who will say before Thee thrice every day, ‘ Holy, holy, holy ’ ? Save me from the hand of this foolish king, as Thou didst once save Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah from the burning furnace, and Daniel from the den of lions, and cause me to find favour and grace in his eyes.” She broke forth into tears, and further prayed and earnestly supplicated : “ I beseech Thee, hear this prayer, hearken to my supplication at this time, when we are banished and removed from our land. Ah ! on account of our sins hast Thou delivered us, that that which is written might be fulfilled in us : ‘ And then ye shall sell yourselves unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you.' A law has been issued to kill us, and we are all appointed to the sword and to utter extermination. The children of Abraham are clothed in sackcloth, and they have thrown ashes upon their heads. If our forefathers have sinned, why are the children guilty ? If we are destroyed, who will then praise Thee ? If the children have sinned and provoked Thine anger, what have the sucklings done ? The inhabitants of Jerusalem have moved from their graves because Thou hast delivered their children to the slaughter. Thou makest us vanish away like the clouds of heaven. How few are our days of joy ! To the wicked Haman hast Thou delivered us—to our enemy—to be slaughtered. I will remember before Thee the deeds of Thy beloved. Of Abraham I will begin to say: Thou hast tried him with all trials; Thou hast proved him, and found him faithful. Oh, assist and support his beloved children, whom Thou hast brought to Thyself by the seal of the covenant. Demand an account from Haman for our disgrace, and take vengeance on the son of Hamdatha by the hands of Thy people Israel, whom he wants to cut off like a lamb, and whom he oppresses grievously in all their places.

"Thou hast made an everlasting covenant with us. By the binding (sacrifice) of Isaac do thou raise us up ! Behold, Haman has offered the king ten thousand talents of silver to buy us ! Hear us, and bring us out from tribulation into freedom. Break down the mighty, yea, break down Haman, that he should not rise from his fall." And Esther lifted up her voice and cried aloud, and lamented bitterly. With tears she prayed fervently, so that her throat and lips became dry, and her eyes became dim from weeping. Esther thought in her heart, and said: "It may be when I go to the king he will not listen to me. Nevertheless, I shall go to the king to pray for mercy upon mine inheritance, and may an angel of mercy go before me, and grace and favour accompany me, the righteousness of Abraham prevent me, the sacrifice of Isaac support me, the goodness of Jacob be given into my mouth, and the gracefulness of Joseph upon my tongue. Happy is the man who trusts in God, for he that trusts in Him shall not be confounded. He will extend to me His right hand and His left, with which He created the whole world. You, all you Israel, pray for mercy for me (for I rely upon your kindness), as I also pray for mercy on your behalf. For whatever a man asks in the time of his distress from the Holy One, blessed be He ! his prayer is heard. Let us see that we do the (good) deeds of our fathers, and He will answer our petition. The left hand of Abraham seized Isaac by the throat, and his right hand held the knife. He willingly did the will of Thy word, and did not delay to carry out Thy message. Heaven opened its windows to give place to the angels from on high who cried bitterly, and said thus : 'Woe to the world if this deed be done !' I also call upon thee, O answer me ! For Thou answerest the prayer of him who is oppressed and afflicted. Thou seest the afflicted soul. Thou art called the merciful and the gracious ; Thou art slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy and truth, and forgivest iniquity and transgression ; Thou keepest the covenant of grace to those who love Thee and keep Thy commandments for a thousand generations. Yea, by our fathers wast Thou called the merciful. This covenant which Thou hast made was with them. Thou hast heard the voice of Jonah, when he sat and wept like a woman in childbirth ; hear also our voice and answer us, and bring us out from tribulation into freedom. Three days I have already fasted before Thee, what can I do more ? Lord of the universe ! I have forgotten the fast of the fourth and the fifth, but I fasted three days according to the three days in which Abraham went to bind his son upon the altar before Thee. Thou didst then make a covenant with him, and didst promise him : ' Whenever thy children shall be in tribulation, I will remember them favourably for the sake of the sacrifice of their father Isaac, and will redeem them.' Again, I fasted three days in reference to the three divisions, the priests, Levites, and Israelites, who stood at the foot of Mount Sinai when they said : ‘ All that the Lord hath spoken, we will do and obey.’ Therefore redeem them from this oppression ! ” And Esther continued to pray, and said : “ O God, Lord of hosts ! Thou that searchest the heart and reins, remember in this hour the righteousness of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, and do not turn away from my petition, nor delay an answer to my request ! ” Esther then put on royal apparel and stood at the gate of the royal palace of the inner court, opposite to the royal palace, and the king sat upon his throne opposite the gate. And when the king saw Queen Esther standing in the court, she found favour and grace in his sight. But the royal executioners¹ who stood there were ready to kill Esther ; then the king stretched out the golden sceptre which he held in his hand to her, and she approached and touched the top of the sceptre.

Then the king said to her : “ What wilt thou, Queen Esther ? and what is thy request ? It shall be given thee even to the half of the kingdom.” When Esther heard these words she trembled, and said : “ I ask for nothing else, but if it please the king, let the king and Haman come this day unto the banquet that I have prepared for him.”

And the king said : “ Call Haman, and make him hasten to do as Esther has said.” So the king and Haman came to the banquet that Esther had prepared. And the king said to Esther while drinking wine : “ What is thy petition ? and it shall be granted thee ; and what is thy request ? even to the half of the kingdom it shall be performed.” Then answered Esther and said : " My petition and my request ? Thou, O king, art good without parallel, and if I have found favour and grace and mercy before thee, and if it please the king to grant my petition and to perform my request, let the king and Haman come to the banquet that I shall prepare for them, and I will to-morrow do as the king has said." For three reasons Esther invited Haman to the banquet. First, because Esther knew that Haman was angry against Hathach, and was about to kill him, for his going on errands between her and Mordecai, and therefore she thought : " I will invite him to the banquet in order to appease him." Secondly, she thought : " I may eradicate the hatred from his heart, and again I shall excite the jealousy of Ahhashverosh against Haman, for the king will say : ' What must be the reason that of all my governors Esther invited none but Haman to the banquet ? ' " Thirdly, she thought : " The eyes of all Israel are directed towards me, that I should request the king to kill Haman ; I will therefore invite him to the banquet, in order that the heart of Israel may be changed and directed to the heavenly Father to ask for mercy from Him." Then went Haman forth that day joyful and glad of heart ; but when Haman saw Mordecai in the king's gate, that he stood not up nor moved for him, he was filled with wrath against Mordecai. Nevertheless, Haman restrained himself and went to his house, and he sent and fetched his friends and Zeresh his wife. And Haman recounted unto them the glory of his riches, and the multitude of his children, and all the things wherein the king had promoted him, and how he had advanced him above the princes and servants of the king. Haman said, " Moreover, yea, Esther the queen allowed no man to come in with the king unto the banquet that she had prepared but myself ; and to-morrow also I am invited by her together with the king. Yet all this gives me no joy, and I am not pleased so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king's gate." Then said Zeresh his wife and all his friends unto him : " Thou canst not throw him into fire, be-

In that night great lamentation of the infants of Israel went up to heaven, and it resounded before the Lord of the universe like the voice of kids and goats; so that the angels from on high were moved and trembled, and said to one another: "Has, perchance, the time come that the world should be destroyed?" Then they assembled and went before the Lord of the universe. The Lord asked them: "What is this voice of kids that I hear?" Then the attribute of mercy answered: "It is no voice of kids which Thou hearest, but the voice of the infants of Israel, against whom the wicked Haman issued a decree that they should be killed." Immediately, the Lord of the universe was full of compassion and goodness, and He commanded to tear the seal which sealed Israel's evil destiny, and ordered the angel who is in charge of confusion to confound Ahhashverosh, and to deprive him of his sleep. Very early in the morning Ahhashverosh rose with a sad countenance, and gave order to Shimshe the scribe to bring the Chronicle in which were recorded the events that took place in Medo-Persia from the earliest times. When Shimshe the scribe saw what was told concerning Mordecai in the affair of Bigthan and Theresh, he turned over the leaves and did want to read them; but it was the will of the Lord of the world that the leaves should open and read of themselves before the king the record written on them. He then saw and considered what was written in the Chronicle, that it revealed concerning the deed of Mordecai in the matter of Bigthan and Theresh, two officers of the king, keepers of his head, that they wanted to stretch out their hands and kill King Ahhashverosh. And the king said : " What honour and dignity hath been done to Mordecai for this ? " Then said the young men of the king that ministered unto him : " Nothing was done for him." And the king said : " Who is in the court ? " Haman was come into the outward court of the king's house to speak to the king to hang Mordecai on the gallows that he had prepared for him. And the young men of the king said to him : " Behold, Haman stands in the court." And the king said : " Let him come in." So Haman came in. Then the king said to him : " What shall be done to the man whom the king desires to honour ? " Now Haman thought in his heart, who among all the king's servants are so worthy as I am, and to whom would the king delight to do honour more than to myself ? Haman answered and said to the king : " For the man whom the king wishes to honour, let royal apparel be brought which the king is accustomed to wear, and the horse that the king is accustomed to ride, and let the crown of the kingdom be placed on his head, and let the apparel and the horse be delivered to the hand of one of the king's most noble princes, that they may array the man withal whom the king delights to honour, and cause him to ride on horseback through the street of the city, and proclaim before him : ' Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delights to honour ! ' " Then the king gazed upon Haman, and thought in his heart : " Haman wants to kill me and to reign in my stead, as I see in his face." And the king said to Haman : " Make ready, and go into the royal treasury and take from the wardrobe a purple covering, an apparel of fine silk, adorned with fringes and costly stones and pearls, having bells of gold on its four corners, and pomegranates on every side. Bring also from there the great golden Macedonian crown¹ which was brought to me from the province on the first day that I was raised to the kingdom. Further, bring from there the sword and the coat of mail which were brought to me from the country of Cush, and the two royal veils embroidered with pearls which were brought to me from Africa; then fetch from the royal stables the horse whose name is Hippus Regius² (royal horse) which I rode on my coronation day, and go and invest Mordecai with all these marks of distinction." Haman answered and said: "There are many Jews in Shushan, the capital, by the name of Mordecai, to which of them shall I go?" The king said: "Go to Mordecai, the Jew who spoke good about the king, and who sits at my gate." When Haman heard these words he was in great trouble, his countenance was changed, his sight became dim, his mouth became distorted, his thoughts confused, his loins languid, and his knees beat one against the other. He then addressed the king: "My Lord King, there are many Mordecais in the world, and I do not know of which of them thou hast spoken to me." The king in reply said: "Have I not told thee that I mean Mordecai who sits at my gate?" "But," rejoined Haman, "there are many royal gates, and I do not know of which gate thou hast spoken to me."

² הַפְּרָנוֹ שִׁיפְרָנוֹ should be read instead of שִׁיפְרָנוֹ. The lexicographers—Levy also—have given up the interpretation of this word in despair. My suggested reading stands for ἵππος ἡγεμός, horse of the king. The word rex has passed into Greek (comp. Du Cange, Gloss. Gr.). Of the horse of the King of Byzantium, says Codin (de officiis, cap. xvii., ed. Bonn, p. 97), that it wore pearls and diamonds περὶ τράχηλον, and upon the back the so-called χαιρόμενα. Around the ankles were tied red silk ribbons, which were called τούβια.

"Have I not told thee," said the king, "that I mean the gate which is passed from the harem to the palace?" Haman said: "This man is my enemy, and the enemy of my fathers; I will rather give him ten thousand talents of silver, only let this honour not be done to him." The king replied: "Go and give him ten thousand talents, and he shall rule over thy house, and this honour also shall not be withheld from him." Haman said to the king: "I have ten sons, let them run before the horse (another reading, thy throne), but let not this honour be done to him." The king replied: "Thou and thy sons and thy wife shall be slaves to Mordecai, and this honour shall not be withheld from him." Haman continued: "He is only a common man; place him over a province or over a district,¹ but let not this honour be done to him." The king answered: "I make him to rule over provinces and districts, and all my possessions upon land and sea shall obey him, and this honour shall not be withheld from him." "My fame and thy fame," said Haman, "is spread in all the country, may thy fame and his be spread in all the world, only let not this honour be done to him." The king answered: "A man who spoke good of the king, and has saved him from being killed; his fame shall be spread all over the world, and this honour shall not be withheld from him." Haman said again: "Messengers with letters are already sent out to all the provinces of the king to destroy the people of Mordecai, and yet this honour shall be done to him?" The king answered: "The messengers and the letters which I sent out I invalidate, and this honour shall not be withheld from him." Then the king for the second time rebuked him, and said: "Haman, make haste! Be quick! Do not fail to do all that I command thee!" Now when the wicked Haman saw how his words were received by the king, and that he did not pay any attention to his speech, he went to the royal treasuries bowed down and sad, his head being covered like that of a mourner, his ears deafened, his eyes dim, his mouth distorted, his heart oppressed, his bowels aching, his loins weakened, and his knees beating one against the other. And he took from there the apparel of the king which was brought to him on the first day of his reign, and all sorts of royal things, according as he was commanded, and hastened to the royal stables and fetched the king's horse, which stood at the head of the stable, upon which were suspended stirrups of gold. He then took hold of the horse's bridle, and carried the saddle and harness upon his shoulder, and went to Mordecai, and said to him as follows: "Arise, righteous Mordecai, thou son of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. Thy sackcloth and ashes have won the victory over the ten thousand talents of silver which I promised to deliver from my treasury into the royal treasury, but which were not accepted, because you are beloved by your Father in heaven, who hears your prayers at all times when you come before Him, and delivers you from your enemies. Now arise from your sackcloth and ashes, and put on the royal garment, and ride upon the royal horse." The righteous Mordecai answered and said to the wicked Haman: "Haman, wicked descendant of Amalek, wait one hour, that I may eat food of wormwood and drink bitter waters, and then lead me out and hang me on the gallows." Haman answered and said: "Arise, righteous Mordecai, descendant of a noble generation; so long as you exist, miracles were done for you. The gallows which I erected I have erected to my misfortune. Now stand up, and put on the royal apparel and ride the royal horse, and do not frustrate the words of the king." But Mordecai answered and said to Haman: "He that fasted three days and three nights, how can he mount the royal horse?" When Haman heard these words he went to the royal stores, and brought from there all kinds of spices and ointment, and anointed him and bathed him, put the royal apparel upon him, dressed him up in the nicest fashion, and brought him food which Esther had sent for him.

But before he mounted the royal horse there were sent to him twenty-seven thousand choice young men from the king's house, who carried golden cups in the right hand and golden goblets in the left, and they went before Mordecai and praised him, and proclaimed : " This is done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour ! " When the Israelites saw this they went on his right and left hand, and cried : " This is done to the man whom the King who created heaven and earth delighteth to honour ! " And when Esther observed Mordecai, the son of her father's brother, dressed in royal apparel, wearing the royal crown upon his head and riding upon the royal horse, she thanked and praised the God of heaven for this redemption, and she said to Mordecai : " In thee is fulfilled the Scripture which says : ' He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy from the dunghill, that He may set him with princes, and put him in possession of a throne of honour.' " Mordecai also praised, and said : " Thou hast turned my mourning into joy ; Thou hast taken away the sackcloth from me, and hast clothed me with royal apparel. I praise Thee, O God, for my redemption, and that Thou hast not caused mine enemies to rejoice over me." Then Mordecai returned to the gate of the palace with great honour and dignity ; but Haman went to his house covered with leprosy, sad, and his head wrapped up. He had at that time to perform four offices for Mordecai—(1) He was his barber, and had to shave him; (2) he then was his attendant at the bath ; ¹ (3) his groom, for he led the horse ; (4) his herald, for he proclaimed : " This is done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour." Haman told Zeresh his wife and all his friends what had happened unto him. Then said his wise men and Zeresh his wife to him : " Hast thou never heard of the three Jewish men in the country of Babylon, Hananiah, Mishael, and

Azariah, who, because they did not obey the command of Nebuchadnezzar, were thrown by him into a burning furnace ; but they came out from the flames without being hurt, yea, the flames consumed their oppressors, but they were delivered. Now, if this Mordecai is a descendant of these men, his deeds are like theirs ; and if thou hast begun to fall before him, thou shalt not prevail over him, but shalt continue to fall and not rise any more.” While they were yet speaking, the king’s courtiers came and hastened Haman on to come to the banquet which Esther had prepared. And the king and Haman went to dine with Queen Esther. And the king said to Esther also on the second day of the banquet of wine : “What is thy petition ? and it shall be granted thee ; and what is thy request ? even to the half of the kingdom it shall be performed.” Then answered Esther and said : “If I have found favour and mercy in thy sight, O king, and if it please the king, let my life be granted to me at my petition, and the life of my people at my request: for we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish. But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my peace. Verily, the adversary does not care for the king’s vengeance (or jealousy).” King Ahhashverosh then spake to an interpreter, and the interpreter asked Queen Esther : “Who is this man, and whose son is he, that durst presume in his heart to do so ?” And Esther said : “A bad man and an adversary, even this wicked Haman !” And why is he called Haman, because it means חָמָן, i.e. “this one who wanted to lay violent hands ” on the people of the Jews, who are called the children of the Lord of All, and to kill them. Then Haman was afraid before the king and the queen. And the king arose in his wrath from the banquet of wine, and went into the palace garden, where beautiful trees were cut down to appease his wrath ; but it would not be appeased. Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther the queen, for he saw that there was evil determined against him by the king. When the king returned from the palace garden to the place of the banquet of wine and saw that Haman was fallen upon the couch whereupon Esther was sitting, he said to him : “ Dost thou also want to force the queen before me in my palace ? ” Scarcely had the words gone out from the king’s mouth when they covered Haman’s face. Then said Hharbonah, one of the king’s eunuchs—this Hharbonah is elsewhere mentioned for evil, because he was in the counsel of Haman for hanging Mordecai, but here he is mentioned for good ; for when he saw that misfortune had befallen Haman and his house, he went of his own accord to the king, and said : “ Thee also Haman wished to kill, and to take the kingdom from thee ; but if thou wilt not believe me, send some one to see the gallows which Haman had erected for Mordecai, who spake good for the king. It stands in his house, and is fifty cubits high.” Then said the king to Mordecai : “ Hang him thereon.” In Mordecai was the Scripture verified which says : “ When God is pleased with the ways of a man, He makes his enemies also his supporters.” The king then said further to Mordecai, who had saved the king from being killed : “ Go and take Haman, the enemy and the oppressor of the Jews, and hang him on the gallows which he has now prepared for himself, punish him terribly, and do with him as it seems good to thee.” Presently, Mordecai went from the king and fetched Haman from the gate of the palace, and said to him : “ Come with me, Haman, thou wicked enemy and oppressor of the Jews, and I shall hang thee on the gallows which thou hast erected for thyself.” Then the wicked Haman answered righteous Mordecai : “ Before I am brought to the gallows, I ask of thee, righteous Mordecai, do not hang me on the same gallows on which common criminals are hanged. For I have not held in esteem famous men, and governors of countries were subject under me. I have made kings tremble by a word of my mouth, and countries to be afraid by an utterance of my lips. I, Haman, had the title of viceroy, and was called father of the king. I am afraid that thou wilt do to me as I intended to do to thee. O pity my nobility, and do not kill nor destroy me in the same manner as my ancestor Agag was destroyed ! O Mordecai ! show me kindness in not slaying me as a murderer does, for there are no murderers among you ! Remember not the hatred of Agag and the envy of Amalek against me. Take no vengeance of me as an enemy, and do not have a rancorous feeling against me, as my ancestor Esau had [against Jacob]. Great wonders have been accomplished for thee, as once for thy forefathers when they passed through the sea. My eyes are too dim to see thy face, and I cannot open my mouth before thee that I should take counsel concerning thee from my friends and from my wife Zeresh. I pray thee lord, righteous Mordecai, to have compassion upon my soul, and not to blot out my name so quickly as they blotted out that of my ancestor Amalek, and do not hang my grey head upon the gallows. But if thou art determined to kill me, then cut my head off with the sword of the king, with which all the nobles of the kingdom are beheaded ! ” Then Haman began to cry and to weep, but Mordecai gave no heed to him. And when Haman saw that his words were not heeded, he lamented bitterly in the midst of the palace garden, and cried : “ Hearken unto me, ye trees and plants which I have planted of old, when I, the son of Hamdatha, wanted to go to the Exedra¹ to Bar-Panthera ! Assemble yourselves together and

¹ Levy is of opinion that we must read Alexandria ; but this is impossible (comp. my “Jüd. Gesch.” Ersch u. Gruber, xxvii. p. 28, Nr. 40). Instead of אַכְסָנְדְרִיאָה the reading is evidently אַכְסָדְרָא, a well-known word for Exedra, “hall,” “lecture-room.” The passage in Shabbath (104a) about witchcraft of Bar-Pandira has no reference either to Alexandria nor to Haman. The sense of the above address of Haman to the trees is as follows : “I have planted you when I went for instruction to Bar-Pandira, consequently I must be hanged on one of you, as he was.” We have here a latent attack upon Jesus, whom the Jews call son of Pandira. The Targum insinuates that all the Hamans were educated in the Exedra, or school of Pandira. One can understand the national ill-humour in the midst of dire persecutions, but it is deplorable enough to remember that those who treated Him whom they call son of Pandira, like Haman, have suffered worse than the latter. At the destruction of Jerusalem there were not sufficient trees on which to crucify all of them. Those who bear the character of Haman do not go to the Exedra of the son of Pandira, but rather keep far away from it. המן is in Gematria = זָהָב, Judenhetze. I have written a special treatise concerning son of Pandira and son of Stadah. Suffice it here to say that take counsel, if any of you has fifty cubits in height, upon it Haman's head shall be hanged." The vine said : "I am too short, and, besides, he cannot be hanged upon me, because from me is taken wine for oblations." The fig tree¹ said : "He cannot be hanged on me, because from me was taken the first fruit-offering, and from me Adam and Eve were clothed." The olive tree said : "He cannot be hanged on me, because from me was taken the oil for the lampstand in the temple. Besides, He to whom all the mysteries are not hid created me to pay the bill of debt of the prophet Obadiah. Let, therefore, another be taken to hang him on." The palm tree said to his keeper (God) : "All men know that the tyrant Haman is descendant of Agag and of Amalek, and all kings acknowledge that Thou alone art God, and none beside Thee, and it behoves Thee to redeem Thy children as Thou hast once redeemed their fathers." God answered : "Thou art right in what thou hast said, and in hesitating to be the gallows for Haman, because thou art considered as the companion of the congregation of Zion." The citron tree or paradise apple said : " He cannot be hanged on me, because from me all the people come to take my fruit wherewith to praise Thee " (on the Feast of Tabernacles). The myrtle then opened its mouth, and said : " He cannot be hanged on me, because with me they say joy and gladness,¹ and I am also an associate of the paradise apple tree." The terebinth cried : " On me he cannot be hanged, because Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah, was buried under me." The oak called out : " On me he cannot be hanged, because Absalom, the son of David, remained suspended upon me." The pomegranate tree said : " On me he cannot be hanged, because the righteous are likened to me." The cedar then said : " Hearken to me. Hang the wicked Haman and his ten sons upon the gallows which I have prepared for him." So they hanged Haman upon the tree which he had prepared for Mordecai, and the wrath of the king was pacified. And in Mordecai was fulfilled what is written in Scripture, " The righteous is delivered from oppression, and in his place comes the wicked."

In Shabb. 157a occur the words אֲשָׁחֵי וְאֲשָׁחֵי. It appears to me that אֲשָׁחֵי is meant for the ash tree. The בְּקִסְיָנוֹ, which Löw quotes from Tanchum is to be taken as fraxinus, and therefore the reading is בְּקִסְיָין. The word אַסְפְּנָדָמָן in Tanch. is σφενδαμηνος, the maple in Sinope. Acer pseudo platanus occurs in forms like σπενδαμηνον, ἀσφενδαμηνος, and σφενδαμηνος. Langkawel, p. 16.

§ XI.

On that day did the king Ahhashverosh give the house of Haman, the Jews' enemy, unto Esther the queen. And Mordecai came before the king ; for Esther had told what he was unto her. And the king took his ring, which he had taken from Haman, and gave it to Mordecai. And Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman. And Esther spake yet again before the king, and fell down at his feet, and besought him with tears to put away the mischief of Haman the Agagite, and his devices that he had devised against the Jews. Then the king held out to Esther the golden sceptre. So Esther arose, and stood before the king. And she said : " If it please the king, and if I have found favour in his sight, and the thing seem right before the king, and I be pleasing in his eyes, let it be written to reverse the letters devised by Haman the son of Hamdatha the Agagite, which he wrote to destroy the Jews which are in all the king's provinces : for how can I endure to see the evil that shall come unto my people ?" Then the king Ahhashverosh said to Esther the queen, and to Mordecai the Jew : "Thou hast from the outset committed a fault, for when I asked thee from what nation thou art, in order to make of them kings and princes, and from what family thou art, in order to make some of them governors and generals, thou saidst to me, 'I have not known father and mother, for they died and left me when I was a little child.' But now, behold, I have given Esther the house of Haman, and him they have hanged upon the gallows, because he laid his hand upon the Jews. Write to the Jews, as you think best, in the name of the king, and seal it with the king's ring ; for a writing thus written and sealed is irrevocable." Then were the king's scribes called at that time in the third month, which is the month Sivan, on the twenty-third day thereof ; and it was written, according to all that Mordecai commanded, unto the Jews, and to the satraps, and the governors and princes of the provinces which are from India unto Cush, a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, unto every province according to the writing thereof, and unto every people after their language, and to the Jews according to their writing and language. And he wrote in the name of the king Ahhashverosh, and sealed it with the king's ring ; and sent letters by posts on horseback, riding on swift steeds and young dromedaries : Wherein the king granted the Jews which were in every city to gather themselves together and to stand for their life, to destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish, all the power of the people and province that would assault them, and to take their little ones and women, and households and servants for a prey, upon one day, in all the provinces of the king Ahhashverosh, namely, upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month Adar. The contents of the published royal circular were as follows: "King Ahhashverosh sends a letter to all the inhabitants of the isles and countries, to all the rulers of districts, nobles, and generals who dwell in every country. May your peace be multiplied. I have written this document to apprise you, that although I rule over many nations, and upon the inhabitants of land and sea, yet I am not proud about my power, but will rather walk in lowliness and meekness of spirit all my days in order to provide for your peace and prosperity, and to all who live in my dominion, that there may be free intercourse between those who want to trade by land or by sea between the various peoples and languages. I am the same from one end of the land to the other. It is further made known to you, that in spite of the sincerity and truthfulness of those who love all the nations, revere all kings, and are loyal to all the governors, there are others who stand near to the king, and to whose hands the government was entrusted, who have by their intrigues and falsehoods led the king astray, and have written letters which are not right before heaven, and which are bad before men, and cruel before the king. And this is the petition which they asked from the king, that righteous men should be killed, and much innocent blood should be shed of people who have neither done any evil nor were guilty of death, but were rather righteous. Such are Esther, who is famous for all virtues, and Mordecai, who is expert in every science; and there is no blemish to be found in them nor in their people. I thought to myself that I was requested concerning another nation, and did not know that it concerned the Jews who are called the children of the Lord of all that created heaven and earth, and who led them and their fathers in greater and mightier kingdoms than mine. Haman also, the son of Hamdatha from India,¹ a descendant of Amalek, who came to us and enjoyed much kindness, praise, and dignity from us, whom we made great, and called him ‘father of the king,’ and who sat at the right of the king. He did not know how to appreciate his dignity and how to conduct himself in the kingdom, but harboured thoughts in his heart to kill the king and to take the kingdom from him. Therefore we have caused the son of Hamdatha to be hanged, and all that he deserved we have brought upon his head ; and the Creator of heaven and earth brought his machinations upon his own head.”

The swift messengers upon dromedaries hastened on with the king’s commandment, and the decree was published in Shushan the capital.

And Mordecai went forth from the presence of the king in royal apparel of blue and white, and with a great crown of gold, and with a robe of fine linen and purple : and the city of Shushan rejoiced and was glad. The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honour. And in every province, and in every city, whithersoever the king’s commandment and his decree came, the Jews had gladness and joy, a feast and a good day. And many from the peoples of the land became proselytes ; for the fear of the Jews was fallen upon them. Now, in the twelfth month, which is the month Adar, in the thirteenth day of the same, when the king’s commandment and his decree were to be put in execution, in the day when the enemies of the Jews hoped to have rule over them, in the same day the opposite happened—the Jews ruled over their enemies. The Jews gathered themselves together in their cities, throughout all the provinces of the king Ahhashverosh, to lay hand on such as sought their hurt, and to kill them : and no man could withstand them ; for the fear of them was fallen upon all the peoples. And all the princes of the provinces, and the magistrates, and the governors, and they that did the that he came from the land of Ham, and was a descendant of Amalek. He was called אבא דמלכָא, “father of the king.” It is well known that father was a title of honour, and the Arab women call their husbands “father.” So also the Turkish sultan called Ferdinand III. father after the war, when he took Hungary from him (Hammer, Gesch. des osman. Reichs, iii. 140).

king's business, praised the Jews ; because the fear of Mordecai was fallen upon them. For Mordecai was mighty in the king's house, and his fame went forth throughout all provinces : for the man Mordecai waxed greater and greater. And the Jews smote all their enemies with the stroke of the sword, and with slaughter and destruction, and did what they would unto them that hated them. And in Shushan the capital, the Jews slew and destroyed five hundred men. And they slew also the ten sons of Haman, son of Hamdatha, the oppressor of the Jews ; but on the spoil they laid not their hand. And on the same day the number of the slain in Shushan the capital was given to the king. . . . And the king commanded to do so, and the command was explained in Shushan. Haman was hanged within three cubits. Parshanandatha a cubit distant from him. Parshanandatha was hanged within three cubits. Dalphon a cubit distant from him, and was hanged within three cubits. Aspatha a cubit distant from him, and was hanged within three cubits. Poratha a cubit distant from him, and was hanged within three cubits. Adalya was hanged within three cubits. Aridatha a cubit distant from him, and was hanged within three cubits. Parmashta a cubit distant from him, and was hanged within three cubits. Arisa a cubit distant from him, and was hanged within three cubits. Arida a cubit distant from him, and was hanged within three cubits. Vaisatha, the tenth, a cubit distant from him, and was hanged within three cubits. And so all the ten sons were hanged on the gallows. The gallows was sunk in the earth three cubits, and Haman's last son was three cubits distant from the earth, and so they were hanged within forty-four cubits ; for the length of the gallows was fifty cubits.

Now, when Mordecai came and saw Haman and his sons hanging on the gallows, he addressed him as follows : "Thou hast thought to do evil to the people of Israel, but He who knows the hidden and the revealed things has brought thy design upon thine own head. Thou hast desired to kill us, and to remove us from under the wings of our Father in heaven ; but now have we dealt kindly with thee, and have hanged thee, and thy sons under thy wings." And the Jews that were in Shushan the capital again assembled themselves on the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and killed in Shushan three hundred men ; but on the spoil they laid not their hand. And the rest of the Jews that were in the king's provinces gathered themselves together, and stood as masters for their lives, and had rest from their enemies, and slew of them that hated them seventy and five thousand ; but on the spoil they laid not their hand. These are the men whom they killed in Shushan, namely, those of their enemies who had said to them : "In a few days from now, we shall kill you, and shall dash your children to the ground." This was done on the thirteenth day of the month Adar, and on the fourteenth day of the same, they rested and made it a day of feasting and gladness. Therefore the Jews who were in the villages and in the small towns, made the fourteenth day of Adar a day of feasting and gladness and a good day, and sent portions one to another. And Mordecai wrote these events, and sent letters unto all the Jews that were in all the provinces of the king Ahhashverosh, both nigh and far, to enjoin them that they should keep the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and the fifteenth day of the same, yearly, as the days wherein the Jews had rest from their enemies, and the month which was turned unto them from sorrow to gladness, and from mourning unto a good day, that they should make them days of feasting and gladness, and of sending portions and presents one to another, and gifts to the poor. And the Jews undertook to do as they had begun, and as Mordecai had written on their behalf. Because Haman the son of Hamdatha, the descendant of Agag, the oppressor of all the Jews, had devised against the Jews to destroy them, dipped the dice (i.e. cast the lot), threw the ring, that is, "the lot," in order to confound and to exterminate them.

When the royal scribes of Haman saw him and his sons hanging many days on the gallows, they asked : " Why does Esther transgress what is written in the law, ‘Thou shalt not let his body remain all night upon the tree’?” Esther answered them: “Because King Saul had killed the proselytes of the Gibeonites, his sons hung upon the gallows from the beginning of barley harvest until the day when rain came down upon them, which lasted six months; and when the Israelites came up to appear before the temple, the nations asked them: ‘Why do these hang?’ The Israelites answered them: ‘Because their father has laid his hand upon the proselytes of the Gibeonites and killed them.’ How much more does the wicked Haman and his sons, who wanted to destroy all Israel, deserve to hang on the gallows—yea, for ever!” When Esther came to the king, she said what is written in the book: “Ye shall blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven;” and as Haman was of the seed of Amalek, and had devised an evil device against Israel, it fell upon his own head, and he and his sons were hanged on the gallows.

Therefore, because this has happened to them, they called these days Purim, on account of the lot and of the oppression which befell them, as it is written and explained in this letter (concerning all that the fathers had seen, which led them to appoint a day in commemoration of the miracles which the Lord of heaven did for them), and that their children might know of the past events. The Jews took upon themselves and their children, and the proselytes that shall be added to them, that they shall never cease to keep these two days, in their season, year by year, according to Scripture. And these are remembered and kept in every generation by every family, in every province and in every city; and these days of Purim shall not pass away from the Jews, and their remembrance shall not cease from their children. Then Esther the queen, the daughter of Abihail, and Mordecai the Jew, wrote with all authority, to confirm for the second time the ordinance of Purim; and they ordained that in a leap year the scroll (of Esther) should not be read in the first, but in the second Adar.

He sent letters to all the Jews, to the hundred and twenty-seven provinces of the kingdom of Ahhashverosh, which contained words of peace and truth, to confirm these days of Purim in their appointed times, according as Mordecai the Jew and Esther the queen had enjoined them, and as they had ordained for themselves and for their seed in the matter of their fastings and prayers. And the commandment of Esther confirmed the matters of these days, and it was written in the book of the Scroll (of the Chronicle). And the king Ahhashverosh put a tribute upon the inhabitants of the land ; but when he knew who the people and family of Esther were, he declared them free, and set them over all the nations and over the whole kingdom, and laid that tribute upon the inhabitants of the land and upon the merchants of the sea. And all the acts of his power and of his might, and the full account of the greatness of Mordecai, whereunto the king advanced him, are they not written in the books of the Chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia ? For Mordecai the Jew was viceroy of King Ahhashverosh, president and elder among the Jews, and supreme over all the nations. His fame was from one end of the world to the other. All kings were afraid of him, and trembled when they saw him. This is that Mordecai who is like the star Noga that glitters among the stars, and like the dawn of the morning. He was the Master of the Jews, who had pleasure in the greatness of his brethren, who sought the good of his people, and spoke peace to all his seed.

II.

MITHRA.

1. THERE can be no more erroneous opinion with regard to the book of Esther than that given by Zung in his Gottesd. Vorträge (pp. 14, 15), where he remarks : "The book of Esther is especially a monument of obscurity and of deficiency in the prophetic spirit. For although it was scarcely necessary to mention the Persian king and kingdom 187 times, and his name twenty-six times, yet it found no opportunity to mention the name of God even a single time." This very fact, that it omits to mention the name of God, is rather to be taken as the best testimony concerning the age and the originality of the little book. The name of God could not have been mentioned without awakening a sense in the heart of Israel that the king is far beneath His glory and power. The reproach which Haman made to the Jews consisted just in his saying, "that they do not keep the king's laws," chap. iii. 8. This could not have referred to their not paying taxes, or to their refusal to render any other service to the State which they were obliged to render, but it referred to the religious laws of the country, according to which the Persian king was to be regarded by the people as the human representative of Mithra the sun-god, and they could not possibly so regard him.

That the king of Persia was so regarded, and that Mithra was the image of the sun,¹ will be seen in the following :—

All qualities which occur in the Zendic writings, especially in the Mihryast, are such as are everywhere ascribed to the sun. The same can be observed in the accounts of the Greek and Roman writers. The Mihr (Mithra) yast (Windischmann, 1; Spiegel, Avesta, iii. 79) reads: "Ahuramazda spake: 'When I created Mithra, who possesses wide pasturages, I created him as laudable as myself.'" Ahuramazda signifies the "lord of light," and not "wise lord," as Spiegel, Eran. Alterthumsk. i. 10, says, for it is derived from این, light, just as Nairyocagha connects این with fire.

He perfectly resembles the Greek Zeus, who no less signifies the heavenly light, and is like him the father of Apollo, and of noble sun heroes (Hermes, Bacchus, Heracles, Perseus), and of Vulcan,—so also the progenitor of Mithra as sun and of fire.

Of Mithra it is said in the Mihryast, as well as in the Quarret-nyasis (Spiegel, iii. 9) and elsewhere, that "he has 1000 eyes and 10,000 ears," who sees all and hears everything, as Aelios is called the shining eye (Sophocles, Antig. 870, etc.), and as we read of him in Homer: "Who seest and hearest all" (ὅς πάντ' ἐφορᾶς καὶ πάντ' ἐπακούεις). The horse in the sun-car is called in the Edda, Alswidr, "Omniscient." Therefore is Mithra also called "wide ranging," for he shines and sees over all, just as Odin sees over all with the eye of the sun.

Hence he is called a sleepless, vigilant scout, a penetrating one, and a thousand scout (Wind. Mihryast, x. p. 6), like as the

the above remarks written. Space is wanting to enter upon an extensive exposition. It would become an Oriental mythology; but I believe the task is in a manner accomplished—to refute the opinions and elucidations of Windischmann, particularly in reference to the identity of Mithra and the sun. This might also be done according to Spiegel's Eranische Alterthumskunde, ii. 70. Further proofs are reserved s.d.v. for another occasion. For more information, which owing to the brief space granted me I cannot here adduce, I refer to my following writings:—"Esmun eine archaeologische Untersuchung aus der Geschichte Phöniciens und Kenaans"; 2. "Kaiser und Königsthrone," in Geschichte, Symbol und Sage; 3. Drachenkämpfe, Berlin 1878; 4. Der Phönix und seine Aera; 5. Löwenkämpfe von Nemea bis Golgotha; 6. Weihnachten Ursprünge, Bräuche, Aberglauben; 7. Kittim Chittim, Berlin 1887, etc.

sun is called in Homer: "Who espies the gods and men" (θεῖον σκοπὸς ἡδὲ καὶ ἀνδρῶν, Hymn in Ceres, 63). The ten thousand eyes are only the images of affluence and power, as Ardviçura Anahita has 1000 canals, the three-legged ass needs as much space with his feet as 1000 sheep, or the tree at the Bouru-Kasha produces every year 1000 branches (Spiegel, Alterth. p. 118).

Very remarkable is the passage in the Mihryast which speaks of the eight friends of Mithra, but which neither Wind. nor Spiegel could explain. Damascius says (comp. my Esmun, p. 35): "To Sadukos are born sons, which they call Dioscuri and Kabires, but the eighth is called Esmunus." The Kabires (הברים) are none else than "the friends" spoken of above. The number eight was that of the stars, including Esmun. We read already in Xenophon that they used to swear by Mithra (Μὰ τὸν Μίθρην, Cyrop. viii. 5. 53; Windischm. p. 55). Plutarch reports that Artaxerxes swore also by Mithra; and Darius demanded of the eunuchs to give testimony, looking reverently at the great light of Mithra (σεβόμενος Μίθρου τε φῶς μέγα). Just so was in Homer the sun invoked at taking an oath (comp. Preller, Myth. p. 292; Nitzsch, Nachhomerische Theol. p. 118, etc.). In the Mihryst, § 15, we read: "Mithra the espy, . . . who causes the water to stream, the trees to grow, and who makes the furrows," which is a more correct translation than that of Spiegel. In Aeschylus (Agamemnon, 633) it is said that no one can announce this but Helios, who nourishes the nature of the earth ("τρέφοντος Ἡλίου χθονὸς φύσιν").

He cannot be deceived, he is called Adaoyamna; as the proverbial saying of the sun is: "Nothing is so finely spun, but what is exposed to the light of the sun." Innocent people can in their sufferings call the sun to witness. The sun has seen the act of murder, and brought about its punishment. Pindar speaks of the sun as the measure and the source of all wisdom.

Mithra is an enemy of long sleep. Owing to this, the cock, who, as the watch and the symbol of the sun, drives away evil spirits and wakes men, is his type. In the Vendidad (Spiegel, Avesta, i. 237) we read : "This bird raises his voice on every divine dawn crying : Get up, ye men, praise the best purity, drive away the Daevas ; Daeva Bushyancta dareghogava is running towards you ; he lulls again to sleep the whole corporeal world when it awakes. Long sleep is not becoming to thee." In all folk-lore the cock is the symbol of the sun, and by his crowing drives away evil spirits (comp. my Edd. Studien, pp. 53, 54, etc.). Mithra goes as a victorious warrior to battle against the evil spirits, with a carriage of four white horses, which calls to mind the sun-carriage of Helios. White horses are always everywhere symbols of light. The sun was always a warrior, and Apollo no less than Heracles and Perseus were combatants against the dragons and lions of the night.

2. The Persian king manifests himself as the image of the sun-god Mithra. The king had also "eyes and ears," namely, officers through whom he was made cognizant of everything that was going on. Apuleius says : "He was believed by men as a god, as he through the report of those eyes and ears knew what happened everywhere." No event in his country could be hid before him, as before the sun.

It was a witty remark of Vespasian, who said of a comet with long hair that appeared in his time, that it belonged to the king of Persia, cui capillus effusior,—just as Helios is represented with curly hair. They used to worship the king from a distance, as if by reason of the glow which proceeded from him. Even modern etiquette in the Persian court requires that no one come near before the order to do so is repeatedly given. A young courtier made his fortune, because on the occasion when he was called to come near, he replied : " Misusum (I burn); I pray not to command me to come near." The king appeared upon the golden throne like the sun in the sky ; behind him stood umbrella carriers, [as depicted] upon Persepolitan and Assyrian monuments. Of the education of Minuntshehr, Firdussi muses,—

"A silk umbrella shaded his head." But not for the sake of the shade which he needed, but for the sake of the world, which without the shade would be consumed by the sun. The servants held the sunshade over him as a perpetual sign that he as a sun might, if he were so disposed, burn up the world. All royal usage was transferred from Persia to the modern Oriental lords; just as the carriage of Mithra was drawn by white horses, so are the carriages of kings—as it is more specially told of Cyrus and Xerxes that their carriages were drawn by Nysaeic white horses. He sat behind his seven councillors, as the sun behind the stars. So general became this image, that even a German monk describes an audience which the Greek Embassy had with Charlemagne in this manner: "They saw the emperor at the splendid window, covered with gold and precious stones, shining as the rising sun, and surrounded as by a heavenly host." Strabo has a remarkable notice, to the effect that owing to the continual sun in Shushan, no serpents nor lizards are found there. This is a misunderstanding of the author, who understood in a literal sense what was meant figuratively. Of all the cities of the sun and of Apollo, the saying was, that no serpents could live in them, neither in Delos, nor in Claros, nor in Crete. This is also in Christian legend said to have been the case in more famous spiritual places, and especially in Jerusalem.¹

3. Much more significant appears the identity of the king, Mithra, and the sun, upon important figures and in customs, which are generally misunderstood. In the great hall of the ruins of Persepolis, the king is represented as carrying on a combat with three animals, which stand erect and defend themselves with their forelegs as with hands; all three have each one horn and wings. The king seizes with one hand the horn, and with the other he thrusts the sword into the body. They are now photographed in the great work of

Stolze, though they were very clearly portrayed in former works, such as of Ker Porter and Chardin, and also nicely reproduced by Kossowitz. The opinions about them are curious enough. The whole tableau indicated that the king fights against an enemy endowed with animal qualities and symbolized by it. The wings are everywhere signs of an inhuman nature. With peaceable animals they refer to holy divine nature, but with wild creatures they are signs of demoniac and Daeva nature. So likewise the horns in them are not merely natural signs, but also symbolic. They signify the destructive will of force, for which we have an instructive example in Dan. vii. The horn indicates evil thoughts ; the king breaks it : the belly is the seat of carnal lust and uncleanness ; the king pierces it with the sword.

It is Mithra the sun-hero who is depicted in the king ;— of the animals is represented the nature of the wolf, the lion, and the dragon, which are representatives of the night, and of the enemies of the gods of light. So Odin in the northern doctrine combats the evil spirit in the wolf ; and the wolf is also characterized as a special enemy in the thirteenth Fargard of the Avesta. In the dream of Astyages there appear three hostile men riding respectively upon a lion, a leopard, and a dragon with wings. Diodorus describes monuments in Babylon which represent Semiramis fighting with a leopard, and Ninus with a lion. In the vision of Daniel, also, appear lions, bears, and leopards with wings. The wild creatures are the attributes of the national as well as of the spiritual antithesis. The lion especially is the type of Ahriman, as the king is depicted upon a seal fighting a lion ; and he is in various other groups represented as seizing the bull, the sacred animal of Iranian thought. Hence Apollo combats the dragon, and Heracles combats both the lion and the dragon.

Apollo is especially surnamed "the archer ;" the arrows were figures of the sunbeams ; therefore he is called ἔκατος, ἔκάεργος, ἔκατήβολος, τόξιος ; the arrows rattle in his quiver, he shoots and sends arrows for deliverance and for destruction. It is therefore interesting to observe that the coins of the Arsacide kings usually bear the image of the king carrying a bow in his hand. Mithra was particularly much spoken of at that time, and he appears in names of kings. One of the kings calls himself Mitraetus (Vaillant Imp. Arsac. p. 246). The king intimates that he is the image of the sun Mithra with the bow, and the more so as the use of the bow was much in vogue among the Persians and Parthians. It is to be assumed that the name Mithra also signifies this.

By the transition of Mithra into Mihr, one is reminded not only of the Hebrew verb מְהֻרָה (to hasten), as the arrow flies, but even more so of מִירָה, meaning an archer. One may also compare the Latin mittere, which is used to denote sending an arrow, as missile itself means arrow, dart.

Though, indeed, we read in Plutarch (De Is. et Os. cap. 46) : "Therefore the Persians call Mithra a μεσίτης, mediator;" yet this is not to be understood verbally, but essentially. To ascribe the meaning of mediator to the name Mithra, would be just as erroneous as to explain Christ by μεσίτης, because He is called so. The sun is a mediator, because he is the visible light of Ahuramazda, who manifests himself through his medium. What is called here Mesites is given in the surnames of the Parthian and Syrian kings as Epiphanes, as the one Arsaces calls himself "Αρσάκος μιτράγτος ἐπιφανῆς," namely, he is the visible representative of Mithra himself. That was, too, the arrogance of that Antiochus, who as Epiphanes wanted to destroy the religion of Israel. Just as the throne-culte was transplanted from the Persians to the Western nations, so also the opinion that kings are visible representatives of the sun, or aped the gods—like Mithra the Mesites of Ahuramazda. The name Mesites has had indeed a great significance in Christian doctrine. When the apostle (Gal. iii. 20) says: "οὐ μεσίτης ἐνὸς οὐκ ἔστιν, οὐ δὲ Θεὶς εἰς ἔστιν," we obtain from the use of the word a clear idea of Mithra. Neither is he ἐνός, for he is only as sun the visible operating agent of Ahuramazda ; nor is Christ ἐνός, for what He is, that He lives and works as the visible and incarnate Logos. The apostle could therefore say : For there is one God, one Mesites also between God and men (1 Tim. ii. 5) ; just as Jesus says to His disciples, "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father" (John xiv. 9). Precisely from this idea of Mithra is seen that his name included the essence of the visible sun.

4. A peculiar but instructive report is given by Ctesias in Athenaeus (comp. Ctesiae fragm. p. 79, ed. Paris), that it is permitted to the king of Persia to get drunk on the day when offerings are made to Mithra ; and from Duris it is reported, that the king does this on the feast Mithra, when he also dances the Persian dance. This report has not been quite understood. The month Mihr (Mithra) corresponded to the month Tishri in the Jewish calendar, and was the beginning of the civil year. I have through this circumstance explained the name itself (Lit. u. Gesch. p. 319) ; it corresponded to October, which was everywhere the proper month for vintage. It is indeed called by the Anglo-Saxons Vinterfylled, that is, vintage month, and also Vindumemanoth or Winmanoth, from the Latin vindemia. The feast of the sixteenth day in the month Mihr is called mehr rûz, and lasted to the twenty-first, which was high festival. These days correspond to the Feast of Tabernacles, which obviously was originally a nature feast, and only through the Mosaic law was elevated to the position of a religious feast. It is at any rate interesting that Plutarch in his Table-talk speaks of the Feast of Tabernacles "as falling in the midst of the time of vintage," and is of opinion that it was dedicated to Bacchus.

So then we see that the king's conduct on the Mithra-feast was connected with the feast of vintage. The vine thrives through the sun ; he produces the juice in the grape ; Mithra, the sun, drinks the wine, his production,—this the king as his representative imitates ; it is the portion of victory by which Mithra celebrates the victory of the sun over the nightly darkness. Of such a feast of victory the Persian tradition rightly reminds. It is said, that on this day the kings were anointed with oil, and adorned with the crown upon which was to be seen the image of the sun. Then a dish containing fruit, white grapes, seven berries, myrtle, citrons, sugar, and other things was brought to the king—all signs of productiveness which the sun caused to the earth.

The tradition, that on that day Feridun was victorious over Dahak agrees with this; they saw in it an act of emancipation and deliverance, which has its Biblical counterpart in the words of the Psalmist : "I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord" (Ps. cxvi. 13).

Mithra rejoices over his victory. So King David dances before the ark ; and a Latin hymn calls upon the east and the west, upon heaven and earth, mountain and river, to move their hands for joy. On this rests the old popular notion, that on the feasts of Christ the sun dances and leaps for joy. In Silesia and other places they used to place a tub of water in the court, in order to see in it the skipping of the lamb-offering. People were so sure that the leaping of the sun became signs of the calendar, as to be quite certain that the introduction of the Gregorian calendar was faultless. In the Christian Church the Feast of Tabernacles was not preserved, and its place is occupied by Christmas. This has occurred not without deep thought. When paganism was still prevalent, there was a repeated attempt to dedicate Christmas day to the sun instead of to Christ. Indeed, it was notably Julian, who fell in the war against the Persians, who exerted himself to make January 1 as a sun-feast, in order thereby to displace Christmas day, which was then on January 6. It is probable that a trans-ference of New Year from October to January had also taken place among the Persians. When Golius says the Arabs called the feast Mihragzan, the sixth day of the feast, "night of the kindling of the fire," he appears to confound this with January 6, viz. Epiphany, which was in fact called Photoa (feast of lights). The drinking of the king on the Mihragzan illustrates a peculiar popular custom in connection with January 6, which was especially preserved in the Netherlands in quite a different manner. They proceed to the election of a king; and that person is chosen who finds a bean in the royal cake given to him, or who draws a royal figure from a bag containing other figures. The chosen king is then duly crowned and his court established; after which follows feasting on good and sweet things, as on the day of Mithra; and when the king raises his glass, all shout with joy, "The king drinks." Thus the Occident gives a mirror of ancient Oriental usage.

A much-spoken-of myth of Mithra is, that he was born of a rock, ἐκ πέτρας γεγένησθαι, as Justin says. The poet Commoedianus calls him "Invictus de petra natus." Even John Lydus calls him πετρογενής. It did not suggest itself to the expositors that the same is said of the Greek gods of light. Apollo was born in Delos, an unsightly rocky island. The island in which Aesculapius, son of Apollo, was worshipped, Κός, Cos, means a rock. The Dioscuri were born upon a cliff near Pephnos. Parallel to this, might be considered the reported solemnities as held in his honour in a cave (σπήλαιον) out of which he came forth. "Everywhere," says Porphyrius, "where Mithra is known, God is propitiated by a cave." And he adds that such caves were consecrated to Zeus in Crete, to the moon and Lightpan in Arcadia, and to Dionysus in Naxos. The writer overlooked that Hermes was in a hidden grotto of a hill; and that Perseus, who appears as a Greek Mithra, of whom the oracle speaks as of "a winged lion," whose name reminds the ancients of Persia, came into the world in a subterranean dungeon. The births in rocks and in caves represent both the battle and the victory of the god of light. As the demigods must fight against the giants of the rocks to secure their existence. The sun rises out of obscurity. Out of the crags of the rocks, where nothing thrives, rises the light, in order to make everything fruitful, just as the spark issues from the stone.

This is spiritualized in the Old Testament. The whole of theology had its birthplace in isolated localities. The whole doctrine about God was hidden at the beginning. Moses came from the rigid desert in order to educate his people in the desert. On a hidden rocky mountain (Sinai-rock) God was revealed.

What could be more hidden than Bethlehem and Nazareth ? The stable is like a cave, out of which came the Light. As Moses brought forth water out of the rock, so Jesus says that He will make disciples of stones if men will not hear. Peter was a man of flint.

The report of Elisaeus the Armenian, that Mihr was a divine incarnation, and that he was a king of divine descent, has its origin in the tendency to find Mithra again in Christ. The sun comes forth out of the obscure deep, just as the spiritual light of the nations comes out of the hidden corners of the nations. That which is told of the cattle robbery which Mithra has committed, certainly signifies the deliverance of the fertility of the earth from the hands of darkness and frigidity. For, as we saw above, cattle and earth mean the same thing. So Perseus delivers Andromeda, who represents the earth as sustaining men. The sun has herds of cattle with which Hermes has his lively game. Geryon is a lord of the nether world, from whom Heracles robs his flock, and gives back to the earth, as agriculture, fertility.

Least of all, in our opinion, has the so-called Mithra-offering, whose relief is in the Louvre in Paris, been understood. Mithra as a youth, dressed in Oriental costume, pierces with his sword the neck of a bull, while he lifts the head upwards. Blood streams. There are the words : Nama sebesio.

A dog, a serpent, and a scorpion are present. The tail of the bull ends in the form of a bundle of corn. A raven sits upon a rock behind Mithra. Two genii with erected torches stand there, upon one the sun with the morning star, upon the other the moon with the evening stars. There was always the mistake committed in assuming that Mithra does violence to the bull, which is otherwise ascribed to Ahriman. Just the contrary is the case. What he does is a benefit. Therefore he is worshipped. It represents the consecration of his life. The bull is the earth, his blood is the water, without which the earth cannot thrive. Mithra is the sun, who with golden sword, his ray, opens the earth. Its being apparently wounded, is its safety. The bull has therefore a sheaf of corn on his tail, as a sign of the fruit which Mithra produces. The wolf (which may more properly be instead of the dog), the serpent, and the scorpion are hostile creatures which defile the earth and desire to destroy Mithra's work. The raven behind Mithra belongs to the sun-worship. It is the servant of Apollo, as Coronis, the crow, is his beloved. Where there is a service of Apollo there are ravens, as hence two ravens, "Hugin and Munin," accompany Odin. Nama sebesio is not difficult to explain. Nama expresses celebration, sebesio is equivalent to Sabazios. It well belongs to the Hebrew שָׁבֵשׁ, not because it contains the idea of rest, but of celebration. It is Mithra's feast,—the deeds of his power, the nature of his life, that he displays when he kills the bull from morning till evening.

5. Much has been written and copied about the mysteries and the solemnities of the worship of Mithra. The central point in all the writing is Mithra as a sun. This is recognised in the names of the animals, or in the masks of animals in which the initiated appeared. The famous passage of Porphyrius (De Abst. iv. 16) has from this side not yet been understood. What is remarkable in it is, that it is influenced by Persian as well as Egyptian interpretations. In Egypt especially the lion was sacred to the sun, because when he entered the zodiacal sign of the lion, the Nile began its fertilizing inundation. Horapollo says, that when the Egyptians pray for a full Nile, they bring the image of a lion. It is therefore the image of the Sphinx, as Arnobius calls it: "that of a fruit-producing lion" (leonis frugiferi). The Egyptian hieroglyphic has no connection with the general nature of the animals, so also not here with the rapacious lion, but only with the one thought, that it is the sign of the happy inundation; hence all wells spring from the jaws of lions. Indeed, Heracles also, who conquers the lion, wears his stamp; and Dionysus, too, appears as a terrifying lion. The initiated went to meet the novice in masks of lions; the mysteries themselves were types of nature's production through the sun. Of these Tertullian says, the lions philosophize (Ad. Marcion, i. cap. 13); but they were not destitute of a natural ethic. As Tertullian reports, the warrior of the mysteries was obliged to throw away his usual wreath, for Mithra was his wreath. There rests upon him to a certain extent the disc of the sun, like a nimbus (as Porphyry narrates, iv. 16);¹ the attendants were called ravens. We have already explained the ravens before. The fathers they call eagles and hirakes (hawks). Of the eagle, who is called

With respect to the marks of the animals, compare especially (p. 351) with the passage of Diodors. i. 62, where he narrates: "It is the custom among the lords of Egypt to put on masks of the head of lions, bulls, and dragons as symbols."

ἀετός (בָּעֵד), as of the rapacious bird in general, it was thought to resemble the sun in seeing at a distance. The eagle, says Aristotle, compels his young ones to gaze at the sun. When the Egyptians, says Horapollo, wished to designate a far-seeing man, they called him a vulture (γύψ). Sacred above all was the hierax, "hawk." Horapollo says: "When one wants to draw the victory of the sun-god, it is done by drawing the hawk." Therefore the image of the Phoenix as a figure of the course of the sun is represented by a crowned eagle, or hierax.¹

Why the Egyptians regarded birds of prey so sacred was, as it is taught, because these birds have a great relish for carcases, around which gather ravens, eagles, and hawks. Among the quadrupeds is the hyena, which has relation to these.

It is interesting information that the female initiates appeared in masks of hyenas; though, indeed, R. Hercher (in the Paris edition, 1856) read λεάίνας instead of ναίνας, but he only followed a conjectural reading; the codices have rightly ναίνας. There is in themselves no difference between the masks of lions and lionesses, but the myth which touches upon the hyenas gives sufficient support to the idea, that just they were the proper images for the initiated. Of them it is said that they are of a double gender, and can be man and wife.

The hyena appears in the legend a decided enemy of the dog, and the dog again was, as an animal of the nether world, obnoxious to the sun and his heroes.

It was said that even the shadows of the sun made dogs dumb. We have indeed but one notice of Porphyry which speaks of the hyena in the mysteries of Mithra; but Salmasius, too, cites īaīvika. In the Latin translation of Palladius (Histor. Lausiaca, cap. 20; comp. Bochart, Hieroz. i. 835) there is an anecdote told, that he once healed a young hyena, and out of gratitude its mother brought him a sheep-skin. The saint said: "Where didst thou get the skin, if thou didst not rob the sheep from some one? What is wrongly obtained I do not accept." The hyena with dejected head prostrated itself before the feet of the saint, and laid down the skin. The saint said again: "I do not accept it unless thou swearest solemnly not to vex the poor by devouring their lambs." The hyena bowed its head as a sign of consent to the words of the saint. It appears to me that this is a story of the conversion of a hyena which originated among the adherents of Mithra.

I was thus far concerned to prove that Windischmann is mistaken in his opinion that Mithra was ever anything else but the sun, and invoked independently from the sun. They are both identified everywhere, although it cannot be contested that some authors have not understood the significance of Mithra. Even if the passage in Curtius (et Solem et Mithrean invocans, iv. 48. 12) were genuine, it could only prove their identity, but not their distinctiveness—because it speaks only of the sun and fire. Strabo is surely a sincere witness to this when he plainly says: "They worship the sun, which they call Mithras." When some say that Mithra was also held as fire, it is to be understood that Mithra was the visible representative of Ahuramazda, who was identified with fire. Mithra, as sun, was identified with Titan (with Osiris, as Statius calls him torquentem cornua, which may just as well refer to the sun as to the bull, the symbol of the fertile earth). And the heretical early Christians found that Mithra signified as much numerically as the mystical Abraxas, namely 365, as the number of the days in a solar year. The Church Fathers have rightly laid stress upon the fact that the heathen of the first centuries, like Julian, upheld the sun-worship in opposition to the doctrine of Christ. Justin Martyr affirmed that there was an imitation of the Communion in the mysteries of Mithra. Tertullian is of opinion that there was also in them an imitation of baptism, the signing of the forehead and of the resurrection of Christ. Dionysius the Areopagite speaks also of such an imitation among the Magi, who celebrated the memory of a threefold Mithra (τριπλασίου), which was obviously only borrowed from Christianity. But not only was the sun everywhere understood by Mithra, but also the opinion was universally held, that the king, and therefore also the Roman emperor, assumed to himself the attributes of Mithra. Dio Cassius narrates that King Tiridates, at his coronation in Rome, said to Nero that he came to worship him as Mithra (προσκυνήσων σε ὡς καὶ τὸν Μίθραν).

Specially noteworthy is the fact that the inscriptions which were designed for Mithra: Deo soli invicto Mithrae, were by Roman emperors entirely appropriated to themselves. Particularly since Commodus they called themselves invictus —a term with which even a month was designated. Caracalla was addressed: invicte imperator! Constantine still bore that title, and Arcadius and Honorius were called invictissimi.

Joined to this by way of a brief reminder, is the strange opinion which wandered from one book to the other, that the Romans kept a Mithra-feast on the 25th of December, which is not merely a fable, but also a striking testimony of the rapidity of bookmaking. The remark of the Roman Calendar of the year 354 to the VIII. Cal. Jan., which read N. I., was understood as Natalis Inocti, viz. Solis, regardless of the fact that this is the only designation of this day—as there is no similar notice in existence. But N. I. only signifies invicti imperatores, and refers to Constantine, who celebrated on the 25th December 351 the decisive day of his assuming the government. Yet even at present one can find in compiled books that Christmas is for this reason observed on the 25th of December, because it was once the day of the Mithra-feast.¹

¹ [The author has, in the above essay, thrown much light on the omission of the name Jehovah or Elohim from the book of Esther. Had they inserted the sacred name, it would either at once have provoked the just appeased king, or it would have been associated with Mithra, and perhaps have been perverted into the same. We know that the heathen have turned the ineffable name into Jove. Macrobius quotes an oracle : Ιαω ὁ παντων ὑπάτος Θεός. According to Jerome, the cultus of Mithras lasted till 377 A.D. It has left its traces even in Germany on the monuments at Hedernheim, near Frankfort-on-the-Main. What a wonderful providence it was which caused the Jews to exercise their usual cleverness in omitting both the name of their God and of the god of the country from this book ! Had they done the latter, we should have had many Jews named Mithridates, as we have many named Jehoshua.—TRANS.]

III.

THE WINGED BULLS OF PERSEPOLIS.

THE monuments which were discovered in the last century in Persia, and in recent years in Assyria, have received great and well-deserved attention, but the knowledge of them is yet incomplete. Those of Persepolis and Nineveh, around which all the monuments of every place may be grouped, have for the culture of all times another importance than is the case with the Greek monuments. Almost all of them disclose indications of the intellectual life of great nations. No writings existed to give us in any way these indications before the monuments were discovered and deciphered. No trace of them is found in all the rich literature which reflects Hellenic art. The scanty information which we possess about some feature of these nations, is not derived from their sentiments, and shows only the smallest part of their spiritual nature.

That the Iranic nations excel the Assyrian by means of religious writings of the Avesta, is of great importance to us; but these writings, owing to the difficulty of the idiom, are still of little use. Therefore a thorough examination of these monuments reveals to us, as it were, antiquity alive again. Sixteen hundred years ago, when Charon, the ferryman in the infernal regions (Lucian), paid a visit to the world, in order to see for himself whether it was so magnificent as the dead had described it to him, his guide, Mercurius, had then to report to him about the monuments of Nineveh. "Nineveh, my dear ferryman, is destroyed, and one cannot even say where it stood. That large city with many towers and high walls is Babylon, whose locality will soon be sought as that of Nineveh." But fortunately Mercurius can now receive information from us. We now know more of Nineveh than it ever seemed probable that we should. Our old philologists were not in a position to regard the artistic monuments of Greece in their relation to the history of the country. They had indeed the hoary sketcher of Grecian art, Homer, whose pictures and statues date of the most ancient time. But this is quite different with respect to the mentioned Asiatic nations. The Oriental monuments not only supply us with the lost literature of poets and describers of art, but they have also done this in ancient times. They were themselves a kind of art literature. Everything may be described in a few words. To express one's thoughts properly and in elegant language is the highest art. So also it is the greatest difficulty with the artist to give a complete expression to the general idea which his mind has grasped, and at the same time to delineate beautifully all the qualities. Homer was the teacher of all the artists of Greece. With the artist in colour and marble, who has carried out his thoughts in the minutest stroke and shade, the general idea is uppermost in his mind. Of this Schiller says, "that it is the germ in the plant which produces the work of art and gives an inexpressible charm to the whole." This cannot be otherwise. The descriptive arts do not in their works create books, in which one should so read that nothing ethereal should remain. The silent beauty which does not need letters and syllables, and which speaks in summary forms, can be more easily brought nearer to completion than the speaking and syllabic beauty. Hence the language in figures is the elementary language of man, and therefore hieroglyphics are attempts of thoughtful people to express their ideas in a beautiful and tangible manner. They have hence become the elements of a sacred language, because they appeal to the soul without effacing the tender pain of the idea through a disguised and confused manner. Next to them was no literature which either did or could communicate what they expressed. Therefore a symbol is like a fleeting hieroglyph of life, and the language of the greatest master is not capable so much as to fathom the depth of this word and reproduce it in a plain and perfect definition. Therefore it would be to make life shallow and dam up its streams, if its symbol should be removed. They would destroy the copious activity of the musing soul, who, if it were possible, could have dissolved it by sober reflection. From this deficiency of language, which is the characteristic of all uncultured nations, but which does by no means imply a want of ideas, much of the life and of the views of the ancient nations is to be explained. In considering the sources of art, we are unable to pursue here all the stand-points which suggest themselves, but it is certain that the chief source of pagan art in all its religious and national relations lies in the need felt of giving utterance by its means. In the Orient especially, which was the cradle of man and of his thoughts, this cradle remained, and in its elementary conditions. This also accounts for the Oriental languages being in relation to ours what a figure of speech is in relation to a word. Hence a metaphor was more used in the East by way of making clear an idea symbolically, than as an object in which a word is incorporated for the sake of its beauty. In communicating his religious views the Oriental was satisfied with a symbolic representation, and had no other intention in it. So, then, we also mean when we speak of the relics of Nineveh and Persepolis, that in their discovery we have not lost such descriptive writers as Pausanias and Philostratus, for such writings as these produced, did not exist. The want of such was essential to the mode of life in the East. There was no literature to excite their production, the monuments were the only literature. Some things have been found, dating from later times, which might illustrate the past, but they are only isolated ruins which remain from the flourishing time of life—groups upon a tablet, representations in relief upon disinterred walls of a palace, monumental stones which form a path to themselves, and in which we recognise remains of another alphabet of ancient thoughts than that of the cuneiform which our experts have deciphered. This is not the case with all, and indeed the same rule and test cannot to most of them be applied. But the already accomplished investigation of single monuments establishes the fact, that they offer us a greater insight into ancient views and fancies, than even was possible to have by the writers of monumental inscriptions themselves. We shall consider one such single monument by way of attempt.

On the plain of Merdosht, thirty-five English miles north-east of Shiras, lie the grand ruins of Persepolis. He that was so fortunate as to see them was quite struck by their phantastic bulk. The ruins stand upon an artificial even platform, hewn out of the rock; on the south side 802, on the north 926, and on the west 1425 feet long. The platform is ascended from the plain by means of double marble steps, which travellers describe as the finest in the world. On the front of the gate, which is reached after climbing up the steps, there are figures in bass-relief of animals of colossal dimensions, which deserve special attention. The columns upon which they appear are immense blocks of marble of $27\frac{1}{2}$ feet in length, 5 feet in width, and 30 feet in height. The animals cover them almost entirely, and only the heads, which are now broken plastically, protrude. Various opinions have been expressed as to the kind of animals they are. But a careful inspection of the cloven hoofs, the powerful jaws, and of the form of the tails, shows to a certainty that they are bulls. This is confirmed by a similar bass-relief of the hinder gate. Here huge bulls are clearly recognised. The legs and bodies are those of bulls, the neck is striped, the ears have ornaments in them. On the head appears a tiara in the form of a cylinder, at both of whose sides are clearly-marked horns, rising from near the eyebrows upwards to the heads of the bulls which, though injured, still disclose human faces, and from their backs proceed gigantic wings; and they are adorned with curled beards. The true meaning of these rare and artistically splendid figures has become more apparent since the finding of similar winged bulls in Chorsabad and Nineveh. The attempts at an explanation hitherto made are acknowledged by the learned themselves as unsatisfactory, because they proceeded from too narrow a standpoint. For it has been disproved that the Persians adored the bull, seeing that in Egypt they scoffed at the worship of Apis, and destroyed the idols. That these winged bulls represent any specific heroes is doubtful, as they are also found in Assyria. Again, to assume, with Lassen, that they are of Babylonian-Assyrian origin, because the Assyrians are older than the Persians, would explain very little why the palace of the Persian kings was chosen as the place for these monuments.

We have already made some remarks above on the figurative language of the Orient. Its soul speaks in images, symbols, and hieroglyphics. Life in the East has from very ancient times another relation to the animal world than it has in the West, not only because of the want of culture there, but also because of the abundance and the variety of animals which are within reach of man. Language, by means of animal designation, or the expression of one's thoughts through animal symbols in a simple or complex form, is therefore of Oriental origin, and is to be considered as a contrast to the Greek Mythos, which first issued from man, and was then applied to the animal symbol. The difference between the Hellenic and Oriental culture is especially to be seen in the different manner in which the Greeks and the Orientals did speak. The Greek spoke, the Oriental symbolized. Hence the conceptions of the Greek became men, those of the Oriental became animals. The fulness of thought which in Greece found its expression in language, was reproduced by the Asiatic in nature, in especially exhausting the animal and vegetable kingdoms. Herodotus says, the Persians had no gods which they thought to be in the form of men. Quite right. But the Persians, who paid homage to the Iranic idea of God, expressed their views in reference to the origin and conditions of the world, in the same manner through the medium of symbolic animals as the Greeks did through symbolic men. The figure of language and of the word was to them still merely an image. Just as the Egyptian wrote by means of figures, notably figures of animals, so the Oriental generally thought that the bird, horse, wolf, lion, etc., are terms capable of containing and giving expression to a whole series of thought. Now, without pursuing this subject in its wide range, we return to the bull-figures, concerning which we are of opinion that they do not represent animals as objects of idolatrous worship, but hieroglyphs and symbols typifying and portraying ancient thought. It is not difficult to recognise which thought the bull was symbolically intended to express when it could not fail to be on the portals of Persepolis. The bull was especially the symbol of the Iranic-Zoroastrian Theology, which we have still preserved in a remarkable though covered and obscure manner in the Zendavesta. The doctrine of Zoroaster, in so far as we gather it from these books, represents a warfare, not merely between virtue and vice, but a strife especially between the civilised agricultural life and the wild, rough, natural, hunting life. Ahuramazda, i.e. Ormuzd, therefore always appears under the figure of tame domestic animals, and when we read in the Third Fargard of the Avesta: Creation of world filled with bodies. What is the third most agreeable thing to this earth? Ahuramazda answers as follows: Where agriculture mostly abounds, and holy Zarathustra blesses the land with corn and fruitful trees. What is the fourth thing most agreeable to this world? When there is plenty of cattle and beasts of burden, etc. All things, therefore, that are sinful, injurious, and imperfect in life are expressed through animals, which are hindering and destructive to agriculture. Therefore Ahuramazda declares that the animals which are most disagreeable to this world are those which Ahriman created, like the wolf and the serpent.

Hence it was imposed upon the Persians as an atonement for a sin, to kill ten thousand lizards (which evidently means a great many sexcents), ten thousand ants, which carry away the grain, and ten thousand gnats. The regular order of things, rich possession of fields and animals, health, good weather, everything which is favourable to the villager and townsman, was created by Ormuzd, and was represented in such images; and the opposite, the mortality of man, and adversity in life in every possible form, was considered as the creatures and weapons of Ahriman. All existent things, only Ahriman hinders their prosperous development. According to these ideas the bull was the picture of happiness, and peculiarly appropriate to designate the earth itself. In the thousands of years before power was given to Ahriman, there lived through Ormuzd, Willea the original bull, i.e. the world was without sin and misery. When the wicked appeared, he poisoned the bull, that he died. From his ribs proceeded man, and from his tail fifty-five kinds of corn, and also the good trees sprang forth. From the seed of the original bull, when purified by the light of the moon, proceeded again a pair of bulls of both sexes, from which all the animals descended. The soul of the first bull after being poisoned went to Ormuzd and said: Whom hast thou appointed for the globe? Ahriman hastened to destroy the earth. Is it man of whom thou hast said, I will create him, that he may learn to protect himself against evil? Ormuzd replied: The bull has become weak through Ahriman's weakness, but man is preserved for a globe, and a time when Ahriman will not be able to exercise his power. Ormuzd is therefore called also in prayers the protector of the soul of the bull, and the seed of the latter is called effulgent, holy, and exalted. It is not the place here to show fully the analogous views of other ancient nations, and we shall only touch upon what is necessary to our purpose. One who was well acquainted with Egypt has collected many passages, according to which Isis, by which name the Egyptians understood the earth, was designated by the picture of a cow. Plutarch plainly says that βοῦς, the ox, was among the Egyptians a symbol of Isis and the earth. It has also long ago been noticed that the Greek word γῆ, earth, comprises the Sanscrit ga, the common name for kine, masculine and feminine. Jacob Grimm has noticed the connection between Old High German Rinta, "earth," and Rind, "kine." So likewise the Sanscrit bhumi, "earth," reminds one of the Greek βοῦς. The old doctrine as, e.g., it is manifested in the Zendavesta, has expressed the bull, but understood the earth. It was an ancient hieroglyphic picture, which the language perhaps occasioned, and later on drew a view from the picture. It was at all times the custom to borrow such hieroglyphic pictures and symbols from analogy of language. Well-known instances are the emblems of many cities of antiquity, which were later called in heraldry "speaking coats of arms," "armes parlantes." Euboea had for its emblem a bull, or a bull's head, βοῦς Εὐβοια; the island Aegina was represented by a goat, which is in Greek αιξ, αιγός. Rhodes had the rose (ρόδον); the city of Cardia, in Thracia, was symbolized by a heart; Melos by an apple; Myrina by a wolf, which is in Greek μυρίνη; Selimos by parsley (σέλινον); Side, in Pamphylia, by a pomegranate (σιδη), as also Granada in Spain. With this is to be compared the better known coats of arms, as of Berlin and Berne, which are represented by a bear, and Bieberach by a beaver. It is an established fact that the bull, as it represents the sense of γῆ in the Zendavesta, is always called by corresponding words which have a similar sound in Zend, Pehlevi, and in Persian. Only in later times was the symbol petrified, and the literal sense of the bull was received into the cult. This appears in the ceremonies which the Avesta prescribes, and which is still carried out by the Parsees, namely, the use of the water of the bull for purification. It almost excites merriment when reading through the treatises concerning this custom, and applying to it the rule of decency. Undoubtedly the ancient idea was, that the water of the bull purifies, viz. in the sense that the bull and the earth are the same. The water that springs from the earth was meant. In this sense the bull became the emblem of the Iranic-Zoroastric faith, and it can be established and explained in various ways. One of the badges of the Persian kingdom is still the club-shaped part of a bull's head. With it Feridun killed the old Persian hero, the wicked Zohak. The later legend explained the origin of the club as coming from the cow which he sucked as a child. In the sacred writings of the Persians the tauriform club is mentioned with which Guershasp killed the demons. It was the chivalrous adornment of all the ancient Persian lords and kings. They bore it on their thrones and into war. It was the formidable weapon of Rustem when he accomplished his herculean deeds, as Firdussi sings,—

He gave them no respite or ground to stand,
But fiercely attacked the whole band.”

In connection with this we mention for the present that the Indian Ciwa is likewise joined with productive nature. Therefore he is called Paçupati, the “lord of the animals,” and the bull is his symbol; whence comes his name Vrishadhvaga, the bearer of the bull banner. To this may be added the hitherto unexplained image of a bull's head upon old Indian coins. Images of Minerva have the shield-emblem of a bull's head, of which the explanation of our well-known student of art Gerhard, is certainly insufficient. Less obscure is it upon the shield of the Geryones who defend themselves against Heracles. An Etruscan bronze figure at Gori has a bull's head; whilst Pausanias tells of a statue of Apollo on which the foot of the god stands upon a bull's head. From this is explained the heads of oxen on coins of Phocis. Coins of Caligula have sometimes the impression of a whole bull, and sometimes only the head of a bull. We know a coin with a fine bull's head, having upon the shield a female figure and circular inscription: Britannia. After these apparently unconnected notices, we cannot leave unmentioned that in the description of the throne of Solomon, which seems to have been after the model of a Persian one: a bull is at the head of the whole order of tame animals which stand under the protection of the king.

Be it also noted that Mirkhond narrates that the Byzantine emperor had caused the Sassanide king Shapur (Sapor) to be sewn up in a skin of a bull and there imprisoned. That the bull was really considered as symbol of the Iranic-Zoroastrian system, and that other nations and tribes had certain animals as symbols upon coins, as, e.g., the Greek-Indian kings were depicted on coins in Cabul hunchbacked upon elephants, which signified the Indian Peritapotamia,¹ is clearly evident from the combination in the bull statues of human heads with wings. The figures are to be regarded as congruous symbols with hieroglyphics. The union of attributes in various kinds of animals upon one figure indicates a union of various thoughts in one symbol. The human head with horns in the front signifies that the enormous strength of the bull is also symbolized in man. Man has and comprehends that which is inherent in the bull. So also was the symbol of the king who represented the land and the Zoroastrian faith. Only heads of such figures appear on coins as that which is ascribed to Pacorus the Arsacide. A coin of the Bactrian king Eukratides shows a king with ear and forehead of a bull. Eckhel reports of a fighting bull with a human face upon a Parsee figure, and also refers to the existence of such upon other coins of Cretan colonies, as upon those of Gela, Agyrium, and Tauromenium. The attribute of the wings is likewise significant. It signifies the connection of the celestial with the terrestrial. By their medium the possibility of harmony between heaven and earth is indicated. For this reason superhuman beings have wings, as also Bundehesh expressly says is the case with daevas. On the other hand, they are expressive of the possession of the power over the kingdom of the air. As the bull's head with the tiara was the symbol of royal power over the Iranian empire, inasmuch as the bull comprised the possessions, the crop, and the earth, so the wings on the same indicated that the king claimed to have dominion over the air. This Firdussi expresses when he represents King Kaikawus, who ruled over the whole world, as being persuaded by a daeva to conquer also the heaven,¹—

 As a shepherd does his flock, so leadest thou mankind in thy wake.
 To only one thing thou mayest lay claim,
 Then shall all the universe be filled with thy fame.
 Hast thou observed the course of the sun,
 And knowest thou how his rise and set do run ?
 Thy rule upon earth thou dost well accomplish,
 What is wanting is that thou dost also heaven vanquish.
 The heart of the king is thus enticed to undertake the deed,
 And he meditates whether somehow he will succeed
 To reach the air with wingless feet ;
 Then inquires of his sages how far
 From here to the moon, and thence to some star.”

Then he ordered to catch eagles and to tie them to a throne, and thus to be carried to heaven. This perhaps gave rise to Lucian's representation of the philosopher Menippus catching an eagle and a vulture, and severing the right wing from the one and the left from the other, and then fastening them with a string strapped to his shoulders, and thus flying to the assembly of the gods in heaven. Lucian further narrates, that Jupiter did not receive Menippus in a very friendly manner, for fear that in a short time all mankind might in this way fly to him ; and so when he was to depart he clipped his wings and let him be carried by Mercury to the earth.

It is remarkable that the use of wings in Grecian art came only in vogue in the Persian war. But when the scholiast on Aristophanes, whom Gerhard quotes, mentions that only in later times did Nike and Eros appear with wings, he means just simply that wings represent heavenly might. For Nike the goddess of victory, and Eros the god of love, have special rule over man.

We will not further enter fully into the domain of Greek and Roman works of art, and upon thoughts in connection with them, which apply wings in manifold ways, but one thing which has remained obscure we must add. An Etruscan vase picture represents the giant Geryon and winged bulls carrying on war against Heracles, as if the same was attributed to them as to the daeva and demon, though this is only corroborated elsewhere by a reported observation upon an Egyptian two-handled vessel called amphora. Wings appear upon other figures of animals, in so far, which we here do not consider, as they in the views of the nations represented the symbol of heavenly or demoniac power.

But the bull, with or without wings, appears as the symbol of Iranic Zoroastrianism, as it is represented in its sacred books. So likewise the opponents of this faith and state, are designated by animal symbols that are hostile to the bull. Here, too, the opposition of the religious and political state is compressed into one element and picture. The traveller Ker Porter found depicted upon the bas-relief on the west end of the platform, a king in the act of fighting with animals, a closer description of which we here omit, and only remark that they represent the lion, the wolf, and the ass, with wings and heads of the eagle. The king appears as the conqueror. Of course the wings do also signify service, civility, or respect, but the political enemy is no less emblematically expressed in them. To this may be compared the dream of King Astyages, of which Moses of Chorene speaks. In it he saw a woman who had three sons. One riding upon a lion hastened to the west, the second upon a leopard ran to the east, and the third upon a dragon, with the wings of an eagle, rushed towards him. Attention needs only be called to the wonderful prophecy of Daniel. A lion with the wings of an eagle, a bear, and a panther, together with a strange wild animal, rise from the sea. The prophet himself interprets them as symbols of great empires and kings. In the second dream this is still more clearly represented,—the Ayil (ram) with two horns, as it appeared to him one higher than the other, and he saw him push westward, northward, and southward, so that no beast could stand before him. But a he-goat with two horns came against him from the west, and vanquished him, and brake his two horns. Of his conquest it is said : “he touched not the ground,” as if he had a swift-winged victory. It is the war of Alexander (Deul Karnain) against Media and Syria which Daniel predicts. All who have seen the winged bulls and lions, or who have read a description of the same, have been reminded of the prophetic mysterious vision of Ezekiel in its entire greatness and wonderful spiritual application. He speaks of figures of animals with wings which had the face of a man, the face of a lion, the face of an ox, and the face of an eagle, upon which the glory of God passed. It is remarkable about this, that while in the first chapter of the prophecy which proceeded by the river Chebar, the word cherubim is not even named, on the other hand, in chap. x., in which the prophetic vision in Jerusalem gets an insight into the mystery, the animals are called Cherubim. Although it was the same animal which he saw by the river Chebar, in the place of an ox appears a cherub, while the lion, man, and eagle are also so called. The significance of this symbolizing, which expressed at the same time the worldly power and the religious view, had an extensive influence upon ancient legends as far as the West. Through its elucidation the monuments of Nineveh will gain in light; its contents are the more important the higher one ascends into the obscure walks of antiquity. And there could not have been merely the simple combination of art and artists, which created figures and porticoes in Nineveh and in Persepolis. The combination and the contrast that there exist between a lion and a bull, as they are represented in a Persepolitan figure, engaged in battle with one another, testify, what may be more fully dwelt upon elsewhere, to the contrast of principles at stake, of which the one which is hostile is always considered as the evil and Satanic one. Art gave expression to the language of these symbols, and without it symbolic representation would have remained inexplicable. On the other hand, the artistic monuments upon which the symbols of remarkable animals are portrayed, elucidate a series of historical information which till then had remained obscure ; of which we only mention a few. It has been affirmed of Grecian monuments of art, that they reacted upon life, as representations upon marble were transported into fancy and knowledge. This also Oriental art has done. The symbol which it has laid down in the figures of the above description, passed into legendary lore without being understood and explained. Rustem the great hero was so strong, that he engraved with his nails figures of eagles and the like upon rocks. The wonderful animals which natives and strangers long centuries after have seen in their gigantic and violent forms upon walls and rocks, were taken up by fancy and by this winged messenger carried farther. After they were found in isolated places, they came forth, loosed the bonds which had kept them tied to the marble, and passed into actual life as pictures of former living and wonderful creatures. Much of the truth of this kind which ancient tales and legends contain has arisen in this manner. The stranger who travelled in the country looked upon the figures as types of existing animals, and could speak of them at home without properly saying what was false. What effect ancient art in the Orient as well as in the Occident produced through the influence of human fancy upon the culture of the nations, has not yet been sufficiently proved, nor applied by authors in criticism. Old Berossus says this in Eusebius clearly enough : "Once when all things were yet in obscurity and chaos, there were also animals of other sorts . . . men with two wings, others with a double pair of wings and two faces, others again who had one body and two heads, one of a man and one of a woman ; other men had a sort of roebuck's legs upon their heads, others had legs of horses, and again others were half horse and half man. Bulls had human heads, and dogs had four bodies with tails of fish ; there were horses with dogs' heads, men and animals with heads of horses, and their lower parts were formed like a fish ; and still many more creatures which united in themselves the appearance of animals of many sorts. There were also fish, dragons, serpents, and other wonderful kinds of animals, whose images were severally preserved in the temple of Bel." Berossus evidently assumed, that the images of the various symbols of animals were such as had actually existed and lived in hoary antiquity. So misunderstood things become by and bye false, the more so when one takes a false way to establish their truth. Only a few years ago, the famous Indologist Lassen declared Ctesias to be a liar, because he says he had seen the Martichoras with the king of Persia, to whom the Indian king gave it as a present. I believe that he may be freed from this reproach. "Here is," says he, "an Indian animal of enormous strength, larger than the largest lion, red of colour like vermillion, and with thick hair like dog's. Among the people of India it is called Martichoras, which translated means 'man.' The head is not like that of an animal, but it has a human-like face. Its legs are like those of a lion, on its tail it has a sting like that of a scorpion."

Who does not see in this a description of some old image of a lion with a human head such as is still found on the monuments of Persia and Assyria ? The notice becomes more interesting from the addition of the name. Martichoras is unanimously explained as Martijakara, "killer of man." We have thus an image of an evil demon for the Iranians, as is also clear from the scorpion-like tail. The form of a lion, as already remarked above, indicated in the animal kingdom hostility. Grotefend has long since found upon an ancient seal Ahriman depicted in a lion. According to the Bundehesh, Ahriman created the scorpion. Its title in the Avesta is : "He is the fulness of death, the destroyer of man, the bringer of unhappiness generally." Ctesias had seen such an image: and when he asked what it meant, he was told that it was Martichoras; and he went home with the impression and the name of an animal which he had never known. In this it is very interesting to notice that we definitely learn to know Ahriman in the form which Heeren wished to explain the Persepolitan giant animals. Now we can explain Martichoras more accurately from the figures. So here also the world since 1814 has turned round. The ancient authors whose credibility has been much doubted, because true descriptions of actual life was missed in them, will receive a new charm when they shall be regarded as guides (Perigeten) and reporters of the truth of art. They made of the picture, life: we shall do well if we make life a picture.¹

¹ The above essay could not be carried out so far as it deservedly requires. It was also not possible to add the scientific references and quotations. Much of that which is above indicated is more fully explained than I could do in the continuation of the Hierozoikous (Lowenkämpfe).

IV.

ZOROASTER.

HIS NAME AND TIME.

THE name Eran (Iran) does not occur in the book of Esther. Classic authors also are unacquainted with it as a title applied to the entire Persian empire. It could not possibly have been so used at the times of Graeco-Persian wars. Doubtless it would otherwise have been mentioned in the records of the Old Testament and by Herodotus, as there seems to be no scarcity of personal names even in the book of Esther, in whose composition it occurs as ari=ariya.—Now, just as Strabo makes record of a province called Ariana, so also we should surely have heard of the name for the whole empire if it had been of a like sound. It is therefore not extraordinary that Spiegel should have found no trace that already in the ancient times such a name was used for the whole empire. It is quite true that, according to the cuneiform versions, King Darius calls himself an Aryan; but he does not give a like term to his whole empire. It is not simply by chance, but for political reasons, that only the title King of Persia or Persia and Media (פְּרָם וּמִדֵּי) occurs in the proper official documents and inscriptions. But taken on its own merits, the name Aryan seems to me to give the best proof that in researches for the home of the Aryan tribe the account of the O. T. has been unreasonably neglected. The cognate sound in the name Ararat (אררט) is beyond doubt.

1. The Scriptures describe the nations as coming down from Ararat. That Ararat means high land is indisputable, especially when one takes into account the various names, such as Aram and Armena, which that district has borne in the past and present. And to interpret Aryans as highlanders is certainly possible, which in later times appears by an abstract form as high, or the honourable one.

Whatever of common culture and religion Aryans and Indians had in common proceeded thence. Aryan conquerors descended to India, just as Mahmud of Gazna and Islam have done.

Herodotus has the remarkable memorial that the Medians were called Aryans in former times, and connects the myth of Medea and Colchis with the change of name. And this is not preserved by him alone.—Diodorus also gives us the sayings of others about a Medus, a son of Medea, who was said to have become king of Media.—That, however, there really are Aryan traces in the legend of Medea is quite clear from the report of Pausanias. He tells us that in Corinth, where Medea lived with Jason, she hid each of her children in the temple of Juno, being under the impression that they would become immortal; that Jason had discovered her engaged in the act, and that their separation followed thereupon. We should not be able to understand what constituted Medea's offence in Jason's eyes if we did not remember the Indian story of Ganga, who, reborn as a human being, weds Santanu, the son of Pratipa. She puts her children into the river to make them immortal; and when Santanu surprises her, she has to separate from him.

It is also noticeable that in the ethnographic table of Genesis, Media (מִדֵּי) alone appears as the son of Japhet, and that in the immediate neighbourhood of יָם (Javan), that is to say, of the Ionic-Greek nation. Up to the time of Cyrus it has the palpable precedence of Persia. Its name also points to the meaning of central position which it possesses. Without doubt Media (מִדֵּי) signifies Zend. maidhya = medius, maidhyana, the middle, a meaning which may have been not alone local, but national and religious as well. A land specially praised and holy, situated between the Jamuna and the

A name of like meaning is applied to China (Tschung Kue). The Greek Messene stands for Middleland (legend tells of a woman of this name, as of Medea). It was said of Delphi, that Apollo there inhabited the earth’s navel, which, however, Varro somewhat prosaically denies. So the Jewish commentators called the Holy Land the navel of the earth (רֶכֶב),—ideas which seem to have been held concerning the Kaaba in Mecca by the adherents of Islam.

The ancient central place occupied by the Medes is proved by this circumstance, that even during the most flourishing period of the Persian empire and during the Persian wars the word “ Median ” was used by the Greeks, and interchangeably for Persian, in the same sense as one now uses “ Iranic ” or “ Aric.” This application is not limited to poetic usage, as when Aeschylus says, “ Such an host as has already inflicted great damage on the Medes,” or as it occurs in Roman poets (cf. Catull. 67 : “ Cum Medi irrupere novum mare,” etc. ; cf. again, “ Otimu Medi pharetra decori,” which was also poetic usage, even when historians like Arrian and Aelian and others use “ Median ” for “ Persian ”). So also it is only poetic metaphor when Tertullian exclaims, “ Alexander vicerat medicam gentem et victus est medica veste.”

But the word has a deeper signification when Herodotus not only makes Themistocles speak of a “ king of the Medes ” (viii, 5), but also places a Greek and a Median party spirit in antithesis. He tells us, for instance, that the Phocians would not become “ Median ” because they were hostile to the Thessalians, the latter being Median. Had these been of the Greek party, he surmises that the Phocians would have become “ Median ” (viii, 30). In like manner he says later on of the Boëtians that they are “ Median ” in their entirety. This is the more peculiar as it is Herodotus specially who records the distinction between the Persians and Medes.

2. The fall of the Median supremacy was, as is well known, brought about by Cyrus.—But it was obviously no mere political revolution. Just as in later times the Sassanides introduced not only a new dynasty, but also a new religious era, so did also the Persians when they became masters of the Median dominion. The folk-lore and science-system, which we call (Zarathustra) after Zoroaster, first came to power over the whole empire with Cyrus.

Through him a political and religious revolution of extraordinary importance in Asiatic and general history was introduced, and which was only fully accomplished by Darius Hystaspes.—I think that even a few historical fragments and legends should suffice to make this probable.

We read in Herodotus (i. 20) that the Magi address Astyages in the following fashion: “King, it is very important to us that your mastership should continue.—For in the other case we shall become slaves of the Medes and lightly esteemed by the Persians. But as long as you are king we participate in the government, and win honour from you.” And when, as Herodotus further records, after the death of Cambyses, pseudo-Smerdes the Magus usurped the throne, it was considered as an attempt on the part of the Medes to regain the mastery,—e.g. Gobryas says (iii. 73): “For now we Persians are being ruled by a Mede, a Magus.”

For this reason the discovery of the fraud caused a universal bitterness among the Persians.

The Magi that could be reached were put to death; and like a Persian Purim, the death of the Magi was long celebrated as a national liberation festival.

According to Herodotus, the Magi formed a tribe of Medes; they represented a sort of priest caste. In the Old Testament, on one occasion Rab-Mag, a Magus, appears in the train of the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar. When later authors call also the Zoroastrian priests by the name Magi, it is only a general term in accordance with old habits.—In itself it was not a name for them. Rather with the mastery of Cyrus there was introduced a Persian hatred against the Magi, as they were identified with the Medes. Could one rely on the interpretation of the Bisutun cuneiform inscription, this would be strikingly confirmed. Darius recounts in it his conquest of pseudo-Smerdes (Bartiya).

"The mastery, which had been snatched from our race, I have brought back again ; I restored it happily as it had formerly been ; I ordered that what Gumata the Magus had professed should not be honoured ; I have the service and temple of the protector of the state, and have given back to the gods what Gumata the Magus had robbed them of . . . and so through the grace of Ahuramazda I have won back that which was lost."

This much is certain, that in this inscription a victory of Ahuramazda over his enemies is celebrated for the reason that Darius had dethroned the Magus.

The historic legend of the rise of Cyrus, as it is recounted by Herodotus and in later Persian poetry, doubtless supports the view that the victory of the old Persian empire was also shared by the Zoroastrian system.

Firdussi recounts from the traditions known to him that it was Kai Khosru (Khosrāv) who built the temple in Bahmandiz for the "Adar Gushasp" (the holy fire). The worship of the latter is always preferred before his. The Bundehešti says that (cap. 17) the fire Adar Gushasp was a friend of Kai Khosru, and that when he destroyed the idol-temple, the fire took its seat on the mane of his horse. Only through his service to the fire Kai Khosru gains the right of succession to the throne. He is the first shah of whom this is told.

There is no doubt that Herodotus's accounts of Cyrus are reflected in the legends of Kai Khosru. It is not only the name that reminds one of this. Kai Khosru is the grandson of the ruler whom he serves, just like Cyrus. As a child he is placed amongst shepherds, and is brought up unrecognised. His royal demeanour soon shows itself. A dream declares his royalty. Kai Khosru alone has the Quarenô, the divine nimbus, which proves him to be a destined king. His grandfather Kai Kans has no nimbus, and indeed retires deeply into the background as one who has injured his grandson. Quarenô is derived from Khar, “to shine.” It is connected with the Hebrew קָרְנָה (Karan), which is used (Ex. xxxiv. 29) when Moses’s face shone so divinely that every one feared to draw near to him. It is manifestly from this that Apollo derives his name Karneios, Karnose, the shining god. It is certain that from this the house of Cyrus or כָּרְשׁ is derived, who manifested himself as the rightful and appointed sovereign. Of course many details diverge in the brilliant mixture of Firdussi’s poem, but the groundwork of similarity cannot be mistaken.—The fact that Herodotus’s account declares Cyrus to have been reared by the woman Spako, or bitch, may be referred to the honours which, as we shall see later on, are paid to the dog in Zoroastrianism. By the action of youthful Cyrus in causing the Persians to till a thorny field one day and enjoy its fruits the next, the essence of Zoroastrianism is really portrayed, which represents the cleansing of the earth from thorns and vermin as religion, in order to have a joyful life later on.

As regards Cambyses, one must not overlook the fact that his killing of apes and burning of the Hephaestos image recall the ideas of the bull and the fire which appear in Zoroastrianism, and concerning which the necessary remarks are given in the preceding Appendix. One must also notice the words which, according to Herodotus (iii. 65), Cambyses addressed to the Persians on his deathbed: “Now therefore, whilst invoking the royal gods (θεοὺς τοὺς βασιλικῶς ἐπικαλέων), I lay it on your consciences — that you do not allow the supremacy to pass again to the Medes. If ye observe this, may the earth bring forth fruit for you, and may you have fruitful vines and herds, and may you be free (in this consists the blessing of Zoroastrianism). And if not, then I invoke on you the contrary of all this.”

3. In a special sense Darius is called the son of Hystaspes.

Darius is the real architect of the great Persian empire, and under him also Zoroastrianism attained its permanent success. The name Hystaspes (Viçtaçpa, Gustasp) is connected with the origin of Zoroastrian teaching. We do not think that he could have been the father of Darius; but this is certain, that through the circumstance that he is called the son of Hystaspes, his adherence to Zoroastrianism receives accentuation, and through that, attainment of royal dignity became easy.

In Viçtaçpa appears the connection with asp, horse. According to the legend of Herodotus, Darius becomes king through the neighing of his horse.

In one of the legends of his life Zoroaster demonstrates upon a horse of Gustasp the truth of his doctrine. Its four feet shrinking into its body disappear; Zoroaster restores to the horse its natural existence; on account of this, Gustasp enlists himself and his son Isfendiar in the service of the new teaching. The consequence of this is that the separate feet emerge again.

I consider in these legends the horse to be the symbol of Persia itself. Many records of the ancients show that Persia is a very special horse-raising country. In the legends of heroes the horse is a prominent associate of the Iranian conquest. Kai Khosru could not become king unless he obtained the horse Behzad which had served his father Siawusch (Syawaksch). The horse, however, quickly allowed the son to catch it when it saw the rein and saddle that had belonged to the father.

But this is not the case with Viçtaçpa alone; also his father Lohrasp and the chief antagonist of Zoroastrianism are named after horses in the legend "Arzasp of Turan," just as the good and the bad genii Tistrya and Apaasha contend with each other in the shape of a white and a black horse.

Persia itself as פָּרָם signifies nothing but horse-land, and is identical with פרש (horse, horseman), just as in modern Persian it means horse and Persian.

In like manner in the various terms of the Hebrew records כְּרֶשׁ (Cyrus, shine) and חַרְשׁ (sunshine) converge. But contained therein is a deeper symbolical thought. The horse, especially the white one, was the type of the sun. Sun-steeds were known to all Oriental nationalities.

In the march of Xerxes and his army, Herodotus describes (vii. 40 and 55) the holy chariot of Zeus drawn by eight white horses, which was followed by the royal chariot.—What Herodotus here ascribes to Zeus is told of Mithra in the Persian sacred scriptures, before whose chariot four gleaming steeds are harnessed; a like chariot is ascribed to Ardvīṣvara Anahita, who resembles Mithra in conception.

It is therefore no wonder that the sun is said to be possessed of swift steeds. Xenophon also expressly calls the chariot that preceded the king's that of the sun. It was a most ingenious combination of the ancients which joined together the name of Perseus with Persia. The legend of this hero is Oriental. Perseus is nothing but פֶרְסֵה, the knight. He comes from heaven a sun-hero on the steed which overcomes the dragon. So the Persian heroes overcome the Azhis dahaka, the evil serpent, of which it is said that it slays men and horses, even as Andromeda is called the rescued “bearer of men.”

The famous hero Kereçaspa, who conquers the terrible Çruvara, signifies perhaps nothing else than the horse, as we shall see farther on.

Also when Herodotus has the statement that the Persians had formerly been called Kephenes by the Greeks, we must not regard this as simply a playful idea. We are reminded of the legends about the conquering smith Kawi and the royal family of Kawi Kawata (Kai Kobad), Kaviuça (Kai Kaus), and Kawi Huçrava (Kai Khosru). The father of Zoroaster is called Purushaçpa (comp. Prexaspes). The translation, “possessing many horses,” does not seem to be the correct one. I would rather suggest here “purus,” pure, and πῦρ, fire, if indeed the name is ancient. But when the Persians have the names of their horses as symbols of the victory of the sun, it is only natural that in the time of their power they should emphasize these names.

Of Graosha, who in reality is perhaps nothing else than Mithra, we are therefore told in the 11th Yaçna (after Spiegel), "whom the four horses guide (carry), without speck (pure), brightly shining, beautiful, holy, wise, swift, obeying the heavenly behest." What he sees in Eastern India (hindu, הינדי), he seizes; what in the Western (כוש), he strikes (conquers). He is the type (ensample) of the king of Persia, who from out of his chariot judges (governs) the Oriental world.

Hitherto I have frequently, and I think justly, used the treasures of the Semitic languages for the explanation of Persian names. It is legitimate per se, because the real relations of men and nations were much freer and wider than the modern science of language seems to be inclined to assume. But there is a reason for it in a narrower sense. It is remarkable that while Media (מדיה) appears already in the table of nations in Genesis, the name of Persia (פרת) appears only late in the time of the captivity, when Israel got into relations with the great empire. Instead of it, however, we find another. At the head of the sons of Shem appears, on the side of Ashur, Arpachshad, Lud and Aram, the name of Elam (עלם). It occurs in Gen. xiv., in company of Amraphel king of Shinar, Arioach king of Elasar, Tidal king of Goyim, as בדורלעמר, king of Elam. It is the opinion of all tradition that this Elam stands here for פרת, Persia. Scripture itself gives us a proof. In Isa. xxi. 2 and Jer. xxv. 25, Elam stands in the same conjunction with Media as usually is the case with Persia. In Isa. xxii. 6 it stands in conjunction with Kir, reminding us either of the Kuran, a tributary from Khusistan to the lower Schatul-Arab, or perhaps of Kur, Kyros, another tributary from the Bhaktegan lake in Fars. The prophet depicts the Elamites as Persians with quivers, chariots, and horses. Finally, Daniel sees his vision in Susa, in the land of Elam, on the river אול (Eulaeus or Choaspes).

The Scriptures, in counting Elam amongst the descendants of Shem, and Media amongst those of Japhet, wish to indicate thereby a difference in language and people. Every Elamitic signification can be explained by Semitic language. In Elam we find high land or plateau, as the name seems to be derived from עלְה, to mount, and brings us to Asia, just as Elyon means high or exalted (as it is explained of Ariya). Shushan (שׁוֹשָׁן) gets its name from the lily, combined with שׁ, white. In Eulaeus we find another form of a Semitic name, Uval, אַבְלִי = אַבְלִי, Juval, the river; while Choaspes was the Arian name, mountain-horse, since the horse was compared to rivers springing from hills.

Highly interesting is the explanation of כָּרְלָעֵמֶר. Schrader has compared with it kings' names from other inscriptions; so Kudur-nanhundi; he also thinks Kudur-Mabuk an Elamitic king. It is related of Kudur-nanhundi that he had robbed an image of the goddess Nana, which returned again to Babylon, and that he laid hands on the temple at Akkad. Kudur-Mabuk calls himself Ruler of the West country. Schrader, however, has not interpreted the name itself. Thirty years ago I called attention to the fact that the names of the ancient kings of Mesopotamia are compounded with those of the gods. This is seen in Kudurlaomer. Kudur occurs in נָבוֹכְדָּרֵץ = נָבוֹכְדָּנֵץ. Benfey reads Nabucodrossor; in the inscriptions, Nabokudurriussur; in Schrader's version, Nabu Khadrachara. It is composed out of Nabo, Zar or azar and Kudur, Kudan, or Adon, Lord; Adir, mighty one. In Laomer we recognise El Amir, "God, Prince." In Kudur-nanhundi, who robbed Nana, I see a composition with the name of the goddess Anahita, the same as Nana, called in the Avesta, Ardvīṣura Anahita, the goddess of fertility. For this reason I consider the Semitic derivation of פָּרָם as the most likely.

In Persia, Elam was the Semitic element; through the preponderance of the Median-Arian tribe, the Arian language became the prevailing one. However, it was only by means of the old reminiscences of Persian life as far as the spirit of the matter required it, especially in worship, which seems to have proceeded from Elam, that the Semitic vocabulary was used.

II.

When Aristagoras came to Sparta to persuade King Kleomenes to war against the Persians, he described to him the condition of the great empire: "They have more good things than all others taken together; beginning with gold, silver, brass, many-coloured garments, cattle, and slaves."

The empire was indeed well cultivated, not only in the Provinces of Asia Minor, but also in Mesopotamia and Persia. All the gifts of the earth were well cultivated. Through good communication the nations were joined to each other. Roads led, as Herodotus describes (v. 25), through inhabited and safe countries. Even the way through the desert to Egypt was made easy by the quantity of water led into the desert (Herod. iii. 6). The remark of Xenophon, that the Persians, wherever they are or come to, have gardens laid out, and make the land beautiful and fertile, characterizes Persian life in manners and morals.¹ The so-called Paradises (פָּרָדִיס, fenced gardens) show more than the desire after luxury and pleasure. The chase of wild animals was not only a warlike game. When Lysander, visiting the younger Cyrus, found him in his garden, he was astonished at the costly culture, the beauty of the trees, the careful tilling of the ground, fertility, and beauty. Hearing that the prince had ordered all, and even worked at it himself, he burst out in the following words: "Rightly I call thee happy, because thou joinest virtue to riches; not understanding that Cyrus followed a still higher motive—a kind of moral obligation. When Xenophon depicts Dascyllium, the capital of a mere satrap, Pherenbazes, as wonderfully cultivated, endowed with gardens and lakes, fit for chase and fishing, with its rich landscape, what must the royal gardens of Susa have been, which the book of Esther praises! Everywhere were trees and gardens found in the splendour of Persian royalty. Firdussi sketches them in his poetical traditions. Art imitated nature in poetry and reality. Firdussi says that when Kai-Khosroe gave a feast,—

“A tree was erected, opaque in its branches, the summit inclining to the throne, the stem of silver, the branches of gold, rubies formed the flowers, fruits of carniol and sapphire smiled out of the dark-green leaves of emeralds.”

The splendour of the palaces and thrones of the caliphs later on, was only a remembrance of the old Persian glory. Caliph Al Moktader had a silver tree; in its branches sat birds of silver and gold, which sang automatically, and were able to move about. Hammer considers the gardens of Chumaruye in Egypt as the first botanical garden, and the type of those in the Arabian Nights. But the Persian kings, in doing these things, did not think of splendour and pleasure only; not of pleasure-gardens only, but the tilling of fields, the culture of meadows,—and not only profit even, but the profit to religion was the real motive.

The teaching of Zoroaster is the religion of a national tilling of the land. To plant trees, make use of forests, to plough the land, to regulate rivers, were the fundamentals of their religion.

What was serviceable to this culture was good; what contrary to it, bad. Animals helping therein were good; those that hindered, demoniac. For a rational, well-conducted life they wanted fire, water, the plough, the ox, the horse, and the dog. Before all, they symbolized the idea of good. Only the useful was good. The Persians explain Micvana, one of their deities, as “a perpetual usefulness.” One of the attributes of Ahuramazda was Cevista, “the most useful.” The Anushaçpentas have the cognomen “always useful;” Arstat, “helping on the world;” fire, “affording use to all.” Spiegel thinks “Çaoka” is nothing but utility. The egoism peculiar to the farmer, according to which weather, time, the field and animals are good according to their usefulness, is the chief doctrine of Zoroastrianism, out of which has been developed its dualism, ethical and historical, social and historical.

A similar view of nature appears, indeed, among all heathen nations. Originally there was a contrast in Zeus and Hera, night; their children were enemies; Zeus represented Ahuramazda; Heracles was victorious over serpents. As the hero of civilisation, he conquers rapacious night, waterless deserts, poisonous swamps, and illness. In the Greek view of the world, these contrasts are united harmoniously. Hera and Zeus marry. Hephaestus becomes a member of the Olympic "round table." Prometheus is taken into favour with an iron ring on his hand. The contrast is also harmonised in Indian mythology, for even the serpents are made alive again through the Amrita.

Neither does the northern legend maintain the full contrast. Loki is one of the Asi, i.e. demigods. In order to free the world-views of the other Aryans of these irreconcilable contrasts, historical events had to take place in them and around them. Nowhere else do we find this sharp contrast but in the dualism of the Persians. The same corresponds only with the view of Holy Scripture. But here the contrast is between spirit and nature, Creator and creature; but there, within nature—profit or hurt of the agriculturist.

This doctrine was brought to a height through the Persians, whose first dynast was Cyrus, and was in opposition to the Hamitic Baal service, ruling from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean, from Babylon to Egypt, with which, however, it must have had, notwithstanding the antagonism, many features in common. This doctrine is ascribed to Zoroaster, who is said to have lived in the time of Gustasp (Hystaspes). Nobody, however, is able to give the meaning of his name, his home, or his generation with certainty. The legend of Zoroaster indicates this doctrine in all its points. His mother has dreams in which lions, tigers, wolves, and dragons attempt to rob her of her child ; they can, however, do nothing to her, for all wild animals are driven away by his doctrine. The child is the only one, born, not only without tears, but coming laughing into the world. This legend is told already by Pliny and Solinus. Tears and pains belong to that hostile nature which he attempts to conquer. Other miracles related of his youth have all the character of his teaching. He sleeps quietly in the fire ; cows and horses minister to him ; the former give him their milk ; wolves have to flee ; as man he has to contend with countless serpents, which dare not hurt him. Vohu-mano commands him to tell the people to take good care of useful animals, and especially not to kill young lambs. Another genius tells him to plant (extend) fire and fire-altars. Cagenta-armaiti tells him not to defile the earth with blood, nor to heap impure matter upon it, but to cultivate it diligently at any price. The care of water, plants, and trees is recommended to him.

In one legend we have a peculiar notice. His mother is told she will be pregnant with her child five months and twenty-three days, i.e. on the twenty-third day of the fifth month she will become mother of a great man. The first month from which to reckon the time of his development can only be December, when the sun appears smallest ; the fifth is the spring month (Ardibihilist), corresponding to our April. On the 23rd the Mohammedans celebrate the feast of Khisr, when the horses are taken to the pastures ; spring-day has conquered. Khisr corresponds with St. George, the George of farmers and gardeners, who conquers the dragon—winter. On his day, the 25th of April, the Emperor of China celebrates the initiation of spring, guiding with his own hand the agricultural plough. In the legend also the victory over winter is thereby transferred to Zoroaster. His name also can alone be explained out of the spirit of his doctrine. Many attempts, it appears to me, have been made to do this, without having regard to harmonious connection with the spirit of his doctrine.

tion generally given, without putting something more satisfactory in its place. Windischmann, following Burnouf, demonstrates that in the name Zarathustra the last part, ustra, may mean camel. As there are names composed with açpa, horse, or ukhsan, ox, so also may Zarathustra be a compound of usthra, camel. Fr. Müller translates therefore: "possessing courageous camels," which Spiegel thinks the most likely. But horse and bullock frequently occur in the teaching of Zoroaster, while camel never occurs in his writings. One ought to find some traces of it; but, on the contrary, it appears to me that the camel, as the animal of the desert and of the hostile Arabs, is repugnant to Zoroaster's views. The name has still less an ideal sense, as "rich in gold," which Bar Bahlul gives; or "gold pure," which Hyde quotes from a Persian; or "gold-star," which Windischmann thinks not problematical, as adduced by Lassen. The opinion of Deinon (fourth century B.C.) inclines to star, who suggests ἀστροθυτης, "sacrificing to stars;" while Bochart reads ἀστροθεατης. One cannot agree to this, as it does not regard the nature of the name; but Bochart is right, that the reading of Deinon is capable of emendation. Had Deinon known anything of Zoroaster's cultus, he would not have called him ἀστροθυτης, "a sacrificer to stars." Most likely his true reading is ἀστροφυτης, born of stars. Windischmann wonders why the Greeks have not pronounced Zarathystres for Zarathustra, rather than Zoroastros or Zoroastres. The reason is, that they recognised in thustra the name of the star, and indeed that of Sirius the Dog-star, as Anquetil and Wahl thought, Tistrya or Teshtri. Sirius was frequently called simply aster, as, e.g., sunstroke is called ἀστροβλησια, from Sirius, under whose light is the greatest heat. I am the more inclined to this interpretation, because Sirius plays an important part in the doctrines of Zoroaster.

It is well known which signification it had in Egypt. People saw in it the forerunner of the Nile-flood and the guardian of its approach. They saw in the manner of its rising a sign of the year's fertility brought about by the flood. From thence began the world's birthday. Thence Jablonski explains its name, Sôthi, "beginning." Thence also Plutarch derives the name from κυεῖν, to bear, and therefore was called Κυων, Canis Major. But we cannot doubt that the star got the name of Dog from being heaven's guardian. Κυεῖν and κυων not only depend upon each other, but in Sanscrit also çua and çvajate, to swell, are related to çvan, çvni, dog, as Plutarch himself, speaking of Horomazes (Ahuramazda), the god of the Persians, says, "he placed a star, Seirios, as guardian, φύλακα, and overseer." The name Seirios itself is very instructive. It is specially brilliant; in 3rd Yaçna, "the brilliant shining;" in 17th Yaçna, "the splendid, majestic." In the Khordavesta its splendour is praised repeatedly. The name is derived from the Semitic זִהְר (סָהָר, Syr. سَهَر), similar to the Arabic word for moon = Isis, whence the connection of Isis and Sirius). Comp. Jablonski, Pantheon, ii. 25. The Greek σειριος, "hot, burning," is taken from the Dog-star. I am the more astonished that Spiegel could doubt whether Sirius and Tir are different in Persian names and texts. Sirios and Tir stand to each other as זִהְר and טַהֲר (Sir—Tir), splendid and pure. The names of Tiri-bazus and Tiridates are taken from Sirius = Tir. That Tir appears as Counter-Sirius may be explained in the same way as that Mithra occurs as an opponent, on account of the damage which the Dog-star heat sometimes occasions. While it brings blessing as "lord of the water," its heat is burning and hurtful. For this reason are the old Bactrian texts right to translate the month Tir with Tistrya. This identity appears plainly in the Tistar-yast of the Khordavesta. Tir is "the arrow," and of Tistrya it is said therein, according to Spiegel, "who is a fearfully flexible arrow, very supple, gliding along like an arrow."

The festival of Tiraghan is therefore most likely placed in the month of Tir, which festival is otherwise called "âbrîzâghân," sprinkling of water; reckoned from April, the month of Tir falls into the Dog-star season. I see in Tistrya, "Tistar," a compound of Tir and aster (stara), and it means nothing else than Sirius-star, as (in Greek) Astrokyon = Dog-star.

The importance of Tistar for the teaching of Zoroaster is eminent. He is praised like Ahuramazda himself. For him the highest genii prepare the way. Above all things his is the task to further fertility by water, like the Egyptian Sothi; he draws out the clouds; animals and plants yearn for him (cf. Spiegel, Avesta, iii. 22). Zoroaster is, so to say, his image. As he, Zoroaster, is overseer over men, so is he over stars; it is therefore natural that Zoroaster's name as benefactor and teacher is taken from him. I see in the name of Zoroaster a formation similar to that of Zerubbabel. זְרוּבָבֵל is derived from זֶרֶת, seed, sperma, Zerubbabel, therefore son, seed, or power from Babel. The same word appears Iranic in Bundehesh as zōr, zōrmed, powerful, zōrs, power; cf. Justi on Bundehesh, 170. 71; in modern Persian زر, power, just as զր means both power and arm. The son and offspring is a sign of manhood, as Jacob says, Gen. xlix. 3: "Thou marrow and firstling of my power." Zarathustra-Zoroaster might therefore express the meaning that he should be a "Son of, or power of, the star;" just as the celebrated pseudo-Messiah of the Jews called himself Barcochba (Son of a Star), referring to the words of Balaam, Num. xxiv. 17: "There shall come a Star out of Jacob," and like the star seen by the Magi standing over the hut of Jesus.

In the foregoing I have changed the reading by Deinon into ἀστροφυτης. It would mean the same, offspring of [a] star; but the meaning found in the Recognitions of Clement has hitherto not been regarded profoundly enough.—If there the name of Zoroaster is expounded by vivum sidus, it does signify "living bodily and incarnate star," which is, indeed, the true sense of the name. This is made plainer still when it is said in the Clementines (l. ix. c. 51), "He is called thus, because a living river of the star had come upon him." Zoroaster is, as it were, the incarnation of the Tistar-spirit.

As in Tistar is understood the fertilizing of the earth and watcher over the earth-blessing in heaven, so Zoroaster is to be understood as he who by his doctrine fertilizes the earth and watches over its safety. It may be asserted with almost certainty that thence is derived the honour shown to the dog in the cultus of the Persians.

We cannot agree with the researches made by Windischmann on the other names which appear to have been in use about Zoroaster. Porphyry confounds him with the Chaldeans when he says: "In Babylon he met with the Chaldeans and came to Zabratos" (read Zaratos). The dualistic doctrine quoted by Aristoxenus as the teaching of Zaratas, who taught Pythagoras, can only be referred to the opinion held concerning the teaching of Zoroaster. This dualism was known as his peculiarity. Whenever the name of Nazaratos occurs, Zaratos is not to be read, for otherwise he could not have been held to be the prophet Ezekiel. When Clement says, Pythagoras has been a zealous follower of Zoroaster, he means nothing else than that he had been his disciple. There is therefore no reason why Zaratus, Zarades, or Zaras should not be considered identical. Windischmann might, indeed, think Apuleius an offensive talker, but he is not the only one who considers Pythagoras a disciple of Zoroaster. The formation of the names Zaratus and Zarades are interesting even in a higher degree. They indicate that the sources from which they are drawn knew the name of Zarathustra, and as they recognised in ustra or astra the sense of star, they obtained by omitting ustra the abbreviation in Zarath.

It seems to have escaped Windischmann that the narration given by Plato of a man of the name of Er, son of Armenios, killed in battle, picked up uninjured ten days later on the battlefield, revived after two days on the funeral pyre, telling what he had seen in the other world, is, indeed, given by Moses of Chorene as an Armenian tradition. Ara, son of Aram (from whom Armenia derives its name), was loved by Semiramis on account of his beauty, but he rejected her offer. In the subsequent war Ara fell in battle, though the queen had given orders to spare him. Moses of Chorenë relates, though he disapproves of it, that the queen by incantations and sorcery had brought Ara again to life. When Clement Alexandrinus, telling the story of Er (Ara), adds, "this is Zoroaster," it proves that the learned Father knew the legend of Zoroaster which is left to us.

There is one account, that Turberatus, a warrior of the army of Aryasphad, killed Zoroaster with the sword. Another relates that Ahuramazda, in compensation for not having made him immortal, had given Zoroaster, a moment before his death, the gift of omniscience, so that he (Zoroaster) had seen the joys of Paradise and the torments of hell, and gained an insight into the wisdom of Ahuramazda.

The accounts of his home, indicate Aramean influences in his teaching. When we are told in Avesta and Bundehesh, that Zoroaster had lived in Airyana Vaeja, i.e. in the country of the sources, Airyana (cf. Justi, p. 265), we have a reference to the country of Ara in Armenia, which is also a land of springs. He is born near the river Dâraja, flowing out of this Airyana. This seems to be the Tigris, called justly the Master of the Bâra rivers. The name in modern Persian is Tir, the arrow, as Tigris is explained by the ancients, just as Tir is Sirius.

It may be added to the above notices on Er, son of Armenius, that he is called a Pamphylian. Such a statement cannot be without reason; but it seems that he became a πάμφυλος because he was πάμφιλος, dilectissimus, much beloved, as he appears in the legend.

Pliny has a remarkable notice, that Zoroaster came from Prokonesos, which is the same as Elaphonnesos, isle of stags. Prox signifies stag (hinnulus), which is a sun-animal, the enemy of the serpent; its skin was the garment of the Eleusinian Mysteria. Mithridates, calling himself Dionysus, had a stag in his coat of arms on his coins. The horn was an old symbolical image for light. Alexander was called the two-horned, because he wore the Persian Quarenô, the divine nimbus of royalty. Zoroaster descends, according to the legend, out of the country of this light. The doctrine of Zoroaster may have appeared as a reformation of the Babylonian Magismus. The enmity against the Magi, of which there are still traces under Darius, is certainly much older. The remembrance thereof is shadowed in the accounts which we have of the contest of Semiramis with Zoroaster. Ctesias tells of a war of Ninus and Semiramis with Oxyartes, a king of the Bactrians, in whom appears no identity with Zoroaster. When later writers tell the same of Zoroaster, we can only explain that Babylonian enmity of the teaching of Zoroaster was identified with this Bactrian as it had proceeded as far as Bactria (Balkh). Moses of Chorene tells of a war of Semiramis with the Median magus Zoroaster, in which she is beaten. Arnobius says in his remarkable notice, that there had been contests between Assyria and Bactria, not only with the sword, but also with different religions. According to a later legend, Zoroaster is killed by Aryasp at the conquest of Balkh (Bactra). The whole story of the Bactrian origin of Zoroaster arose out of this interpretation of Ctesias. Later religious phenomena were by historical learning transferred to these early days.

But into what times ought we to place the actual rise of Zoroaster's teaching, and therefore also his life? I have already stated above that Windischmann attempts to make Apuleius alone responsible for the statement that Pythagoras had been a disciple of Zoroaster. But how should Apuleius get this notion? It cannot be denied that Porphyry means the same; Clement Alexandrinus communicates the same in his learned collections. Other circumstances agree to make it likely that at the beginning of the sixth century before Christ the new movement had arisen. It is Kyros whom I have placed with Kawe Uçrawa (Khosru), who founds the Persian empire. Under Khosru the services of Adar Gushasp become paramount. That the restorer of the Zoroaster-cultus is called a Darius, the son of Hystaspes, shows at least that the doctrine which arose in the time of an Hystaspes cannot have been very far off. From this we can explain how not only Apuleius, but also later writers like Abulfarage and Eutychius make him live under Cambyses. The question is, whether their sources do not refer to Cambyses the father of Cyrus, as Cambyses, in the cuneiform inscriptions Kabuyija, is surely the same as Kave-Uça = Kai Kaus. Agathias relates that he lived under an Hystaspes, but does not know whether he was the father of Darius.

I should like to add another consideration, resting on the spirit of Zoroaster's doctrine, affording an important proof that Zoroaster lived in the beginning of the sixth century. It is not necessary to speak here of the high importance of astronomy and astrology amongst both Chaldeans and Persians. Horoscopy and belief in a man's nativity reach surely into high antiquity. Zoroaster was the Star-son. Upon him flowed the Star-soul. He was the animated Tistrya or Sirius. His life also must come in contact with the Dog-star. Just as the star of the Magi appeared at Christ's birth, so likewise is for Zoroaster's appearance obtained the division of a star period. The cycle of a Dog-star period is, according to Tacitus, well known. He confounds it indeed with the Phoenix period from which it differs. But similar things are predicted of either. Geminus says, that the festival of Isis (identical with Sirius) ran in 1460 years through the whole cycle of the seasons. Ideler, according to Censorinus, has determined that in the year 1322 B.C. a Dog-star period began, which closed 139. But these periods fell into divisions in which the same was celebrated. When, e.g., Tacitus relates that there had been Phoenix appearances under Sesostris, Amasis, Ptolemaeus, and Tiberius, the times which lie between are not full Phoenix periods, but only portions of the same. Between Amasis and Ptolemaeus elapsed as much time as between Ptolemaeus and Tiberius, i.e. 280 years, in round numbers the twenty-ninth portion of a period of 7000, according to Chaerephon, or the hundred and twenty-fifth portion of one taken at 35,000 years. Half of a Dog-star period is 730, which, beginning at 1322, would bring us to about the year 590. Regarding this as the beginning of Zoroaster, this would agree with all the given data, easily bringing out the contemporaneous existence of Pythagoras. The other notices about the life of Zoroaster teach us that these hypotheses delivered to us by antiquity are not without reason, and are more valuable than has hitherto been supposed.

These are three: the first, according to which Hermodor places in a highly valuable note, Zoroaster 5000 years before the destruction of Troy; the second, according to which Eudoxus and Aristotle have fixed the same 6000 before the death of Plato; the third, where Xanthus states Zoroaster's life 6000 years before the campaign of Xerxes. These dates can be judged rightly, only if one calculates them as cycles, having formed a foundation for the teaching of Zoroaster. The events which with the Greeks were used as aids of calculation, are in themselves very interesting. People saw in the Trojan and the Persian war political combinations, the latter as a kind of revenge for the former; both were regarded as conflicts of the East with the Greek West. Plato's previsions, and the opinions about his divine origin, make him, as a Greek prophet, appear as counterpart of Zoroaster the Oriental. In effect, the death of Plato forms an epoch in the Dog-star period, closing 139 B.C. The period, consisting of 1461 years, is divided in halves ($730\frac{1}{2}$ years), thirds of 487 years, and sixths of $243\frac{1}{2}$ years. That they fixed the death of Plato correctly at 348 B.C. is evident. For from B.C. 348 to A.D. 139 is just 487 years, i.e. a third of a Sirius period. By the exact mention of the death of Plato it appears that the above dates have reference to the Dog-star chronology. When Hermodor places Zoroaster 5000 years before the fall of Troy, one must remember that the same was believed in ancient times, as Clement Alex. tells us to have happened 417 before the first Olympiad, i.e. 1192 B.C. Four Dog-star periods amount to 5844. Take their beginning as the commencement of Hermodor's 5000 years, and deduct 844 from 1192, you obtain 348, the year of Plato's death, from which it is evident that this date is also reckoned by the Sirius cycle. From its beginning till A.D. 139 four periods and a-half have elapsed.

The death of Plato has a still nearerer relation to the year indicated above as the eventual time of Zoroaster. Half of the Sirius period beginning B.C. 1322 falls in $591\frac{1}{2}$. Thence to the death of Plato, 348 B.C., elapse $243\frac{1}{2}$ years, just one-sixth of the Sirius period. When one sees the death of Plato reckoned as an epoch in this chronology, one is entitled by the hypothesis (it being two-thirds of the Sirius period) to find therein Zoroaster, "the son of Sirius." When Eudoxus and Aristotle speak of 6000 years before the death of Plato, they make use of a round number instead of 5844, where, indeed, the accuracy of Hermodor is not shown. Such round numbers in chronological data are not uncommon, as when the divisions of the Phoenix period are given at 500 years, while they really amount to 560.

Very remarkable is the statement by Xanthus, who gives 6000 before Xerxes' campaign, anno B.C. 480, showing a richer knowledge of the current Persian chronology. Ideler has shown it probable that the Persian before Mohamed had a cycle consisting of twelve intercalary periods of 120 years. In a cycle of 1440 years the intercalary month ran through the whole year. This cycle stood to the Sirius cycle, having also 365 days, but without intercalation 1440–1461, or every intercalary period of 120 years counted $121\frac{3}{4}$ in the Sirius cycle. Xanthus has surely made use of this chronology. 6000 is 50×120 , and it is remarkable that B.C. 480 is made the boundary whence four intercalary periods run to the star of the Magi. This star, place it exegetically where you like, must be considered not only as a heavenly star, but also as characterizing a new era, and it could also not have been without a reason that the Magi had seen it. It is not without interest that the reign of Cyrus is 560 years, a period of the Phoenix cycle before it.

GRIMM'S LEXICON.

GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON OF THE

BEING

Grimm's Wilke's Clavis Novi Testamenti.

TRANSLATED, REVISED, AND ENLARGED

BY

JOSEPH HENRY THAYER, D.D.,

BUSSEY PROFESSOR OF NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM AND INTERPRETATION IN THE DIVINITY SCHOOL OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

TOwards the close of the year 1862, the "Arnoldische Buchhandlung" in Leipzig published the First Part of a Greek-Latin Lexicon of the New Testament, prepared, upon the basis of the "Clavis Novi Testamenti Philologica" of C. G. Wilke (second edition, 2 vols. 1851), by Professor C. L. WILIBALD GRIMM of Jena. In his Prospectus Professor Grimm announced it as his purpose not only (in accordance with the improvements in classical lexicography embodied in the Paris edition of Stephen's Thesaurus and in the fifth edition of Passow's Dictionary edited by Rost and his coadjutors) to exhibit the historical growth of a word's significations, and accordingly in selecting his vouchers for New Testament usage to show at what time and in what class of writers a given word became current, but also duly to notice the usage of the Septuagint and of the Old Testament Apocrypha, and especially to produce a Lexicon which should correspond to the present condition of textual criticism, of exegesis, and of biblical theology. He devoted more than seven years to his task. The successive Parts of his work received, as they appeared, the outspoken commendation of scholars diverging as widely in their views as Hupfeld and Hengstenberg; and since its completion in 1868 it has been generally acknowledged to be by far the best Lexicon of the New Testament extant.'

"I regard it as a work of the greatest importance. . . . It seems to me a work showing the most patient diligence, and the most carefully arranged collection of useful and helpful references."—THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

"The use of Professor Grimm's book for years has convinced me that it is not only unquestionably the best among existing New Testament Lexicons, but that, apart from all comparisons, it is a work of the highest intrinsic merit, and one which is admirably adapted to initiate a learner into an acquaintance with the language of the New Testament. It ought to be regarded as one of the first and most necessary requisites for the study of the New Testament, and consequently for the study of theology in general."—Professor EMIL SCHÜRER.

"This is indeed a noble volume, and satisfies in these days of advancing scholarship a very great want. It is certainly unequalled in its lexicography, and invaluable in its literary perfectness. . . . It should, will, must make for itself a place in the library of all those students who want to be thoroughly furnished for the work of understanding, expounding, and applying the Word of God."—Evangelical Magazine.

"Undoubtedly the best of its kind. Beautifully printed and well translated, with some corrections and improvements of the original, it will be prized by students of the Christian Scriptures."—Athenaeum.

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION, FROM THE REFORMATION TO KANT.

BY BERNHARD PÜNZER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN BY W. HASTIE, B.D.
WITH A PREFACE BY PROFESSOR FLINT, D.D., LL.D.

'The merits of Pünzer's history are not difficult to discover; on the contrary, they are of the kind which, as the French say, sautent aux yeux. The language is almost everywhere as plain and easy to apprehend as, considering the nature of the matter conveyed, it could be made. The style is simple, natural, and direct; the only sort of style appropriate to the subject. The amount of information imparted is most extensive, and strictly relevant. Nowhere else will student get nearly so much knowledge as to what has been thought and written, within the area of Christendom, on the philosophy of religion. He must be an excessively learned man in that department who has nothing to learn from this book'—Extract from the Preface.

'Pünzer's "History of the Philosophy of Religion" is fuller of information on its subject than any other book of the kind that I have either seen or heard of. The writing in it is, on the whole, clear, simple, and uninvolved. The Translation appears to me true to the German, and, at the same time, a piece of very satisfactory English. I should think the work would prove useful, or even indispensable, as well for clergymen as for professors and students.'—DR. HUTCHISON STIRLING.

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

New Edition, Re-written and Enlarged.

APOSTOLIC CHRISTIANITY, A.D. 1-100. In Two Divisions. Ex. demy 8vo, price 21s.

ANTE-NICENE CHRISTIANITY, A.D. 100-325. In Two Divisions. Ex. demy 8vo, price 21s.

MEDIEVAL CHRISTIANITY, A.D. 590-1073. In Two Divisions. Ex. demy 8vo, price 21s.

'Dr. Schaff's "History of the Christian Church" is the most valuable contribution to Ecclesiastical History that has ever been published in this country. When completed it will have no rival in point of comprehensiveness, and in presenting the results of the most advanced scholarship and the latest discoveries. Each division covers a separate and distinct epoch, and is complete in itself.'

'No student, and indeed no critic, can with fairness overlook a work like the present, written with such evident candour, and, at the same time, with so thorough a knowledge of the sources of early Christian history.'—Scotsman.

'In no other work of its kind with which I am acquainted will students and general readers find so much to instruct and interest them.'—Rev. Prof. HITCHCOCK, D.D.

'A work of the freshest and most conscientious research.'—Dr. JOSEPH COOK, in Boston Monday Lectures.

'Dr. Schaff presents a connected history of all the great movements of thought and action in a pleasant and memorable style. His discrimination is keen, his courage undaunted, his candour transparent, and for general readers he has produced what we have no hesitation in pronouncing the History of the Church.'—Freeman.

The Didachè and Kindred Documents in the Original, with Translations and Discussions of Post-Apostolic Teaching, Baptism, Worship, and Discipline, and with Illustrations and Fac-Similes of the Jerusalem Manuscript.

BY PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D.,

PROFESSOR IN UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, NEW YORK.

'The best work on the Didachè which has yet appeared.'—Churchman.

'Dr. Schaff's "Oldest Church Manual" is by a long way the ablest, most complete, and in every way valuable edition of the recently-discovered "Teaching of the Apostles" which has been or is likely to be published. . . . Dr. Schaff's Prolegomena will henceforth be regarded as indispensable. . . . We have nothing but praise for this most scholarly and valuable edition of the Didachè. We ought to add that it is enriched by a striking portrait of Bryennios and many other useful illustrations.'—Baptist Magazine.

THE SCRIPTURE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH

(Eleventh Series of Cunningham Lectures.)

BY REV. D. DOUGLAS BANNERMAN, M.A.

'Mr. Bannerman has executed his task with commendable impartiality and thoroughness. His learning is ample, his materials have been carefully sifted and clearly arranged, his reasoning is apt, lucid, and forcible, while he has none of the bitterness which so frequently mars controversial works of this class.'—Baptist Magazine.

'The matter is beyond all question of the very holiest and best. . . . We do not hesitate to give the book a hearty recommendation.'—Clergyman's Magazine.

'The Cunningham Lectures have made out an admirable case. His book, indeed, while not written in a controversial spirit, but with calm temper, argumentative power, and abundant learning, is a very forcible vindication of the Presbyterian system, and one which, we suspect, it will be no easy task to refute, whether from the Romanist or the Anglican side.'—Scotsman.

BIBLICO-THEOLOGICAL LEXICON OF NEW

BY HERMANN CREMER, D.D.,

PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF GREIFSWALD.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF THE SECOND EDITION

BY WILLIAM URWICK, M.A.

THE SUPPLEMENT WHICH IS INCLUDED IN THE ABOVE, MAY BE HAD SEPARATELY, price 14s.

TRANSLATOR'S NOTE.

SINCE the publication of the Large English Edition of Professor Cremer's Lexicon by Messrs. T. & T. Clark in the year 1878, a third German edition (1883), and a fourth in the present year (1886), have appeared, containing much additional and valuable matter. Articles upon important words already fully treated have been rearranged and enlarged, and several new words have been inserted. Like most German works of the kind, the Lexicon has grown edition by edition; it is growing, and probably it will still grow in years to come. The noble English Edition of 1878 being stereotyped, it became necessary to embody these Additions in a SUPPLEMENT involving the somewhat difficult task of gathering up and rearranging alterations and insertions under words already discussed, together with the simpler work of translating the articles upon words (upwards of 300) newly added. The present Supplement, extending over 323 pages, embodies both classes of additional matter.

To facilitate reference, a NEW and very copious INDEX of the entire work, Lexicon and Supplement, has been subjoined, enabling the student to consult the work with the same ease as the earlier edition, the arrangement of words by Dr. Cremer not being alphabetical save in groups, and requiring in any case frequent reference to the Index. Here at a glance it will be seen where any word is treated of in either Part.

One main feature of Dr. Cremer's additions is the consideration of the HEBREW EQUIVALENTS to many Greek words, thus making the Lexicon invaluable to the Hebraist. To aid him, the very full and important Hebrew Index, embracing upwards of 800 Hebrew words, and extending over several pages, is appended.

'It is not too much to say that the Supplement will greatly enhance the value of the original work; while of this we imagine it needless to add many words of commendation. It holds a deservedly high position in the estimation of all students of the Sacred tongues.'—Literary Churchman.

'We particularly call attention to this valuable work.'—Clergyman's Magazine.

'Dr. Cremer's work is highly and deservedly esteemed in Germany. It gives with care and thoroughness a complete history, as far as it goes, of each word and phrase that it deals with. . . . Dr. Cremer's explanations are most lucidly set out.'—Guardian.

'It is hardly possible to exaggerate the value of this work to the student of the Greek Testament. . . . The translation is accurate and idiomatic, and the additions to the later edition are considerable and important.'—Church Bells.

'We cannot find an important word in our Greek New Testament which is not discussed with a fulness and discrimination which leaves nothing to be desired.'—Nonconformist.

'This noble edition in quarto of Cremer's Biblico-Theological Lexicon quite supersedes the translation of the first edition of the work. Many of the most important articles have been re-written and re-arranged.'—British Quarterly Review.

PRACTICAL THEOLOGY.

BASED ON THE REAL-ENCYKLOPÄDIE OF HERZOG, PLITT, AND HAUCK.

EDITED BY PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D.,

PROFESSOR IN THE UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, NEW YORK.

'As a comprehensive work of reference, within a moderate compass, we know nothing at all equal to it in the large department which it deals with.'—Church Bells.

'The work will remain as a wonderful monument of industry, learning, and skill. It will be indispensable to the student of specifically Protestant theology; nor, indeed, do we think that any scholar, whatever be his especial line of thought or study, would find it superfluous on his shelves.'—Literary Churchman.

'We commend this work with a touch of enthusiasm, for we have often wanted such ourselves. It embraces in its range of writers all the leading authors of Europe on ecclesiastical questions. A student may deny himself many other volumes to secure this, for it is certain to take a prominent and permanent place in our literature.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'Dr. Schaff's name is a guarantee for valuable and thorough work. His new Encyclopædia (based on Herzog) will be one of the most useful works of the day. It will prove a standard authority on all religious knowledge.'—HOWARD CROSBY, D.D., LL.D., ex-Chancellor of the University, New York.

'This work will prove of great service to many; it supplies a distinct want in our theological literature, and it is sure to meet with welcome from readers who wish a popular book of reference on points of historical, biographical, and theological interest. Many of the articles give facts which may be sought far and wide, and in vain in our encyclopaedias.'—Scotsman.

'It is with great pleasure we now call attention to the third and concluding volume of this work. . . . It is a noble book . . . For our ministerial readers we can scarcely wish anything better than that every one of them should be put in possession of a copy through the generosity of the wealthy laymen of their congregation; such a sowing of good seed would produce results most beneficial both to those who preach and to those who hear. But this Cyclopædia is not by any means for ministerial students only; intelligent and thoughtful minds of all classes will discover in it so much interest and value as will make it a perfect treasure to them.'—Christian World.

MESSIANIC PROPHECY.

BY PROFESSOR C. A. BRIGGS, D.D.,

PROFESSOR OF HEBREW AND THE COGNATE LANGUAGES IN THE UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, NEW YORK;

AUTHOR OF 'BIBLICAL STUDY,' 'AMERICAN PRESBYTERIANISM,' ETC.

NOTE.—This Work discusses all the Messianic passages of the Old Testament in a fresh Translation, with critical notes, and aims to trace the development of the Messianic idea in the Old Testament.

'Professor Briggs' Messianic Prophecy is a most excellent book, in which I greatly rejoice.'—Prof. FRANZ DELITZSCH.

'All scholars will join in recognising its singular usefulness as a text-book. It has been much wanted.'—Rev. Canon CHEYNE.

'Professor Briggs' new book on Messianic Prophecy is a worthy companion to his indispensable text-book on "Biblical Study." . . . He has produced the first English text-book on the subject of Messianic Prophecy which a modern teacher can use.'—The Academy.

BIBLICAL STUDY: ITS PRINCIPLES, METHODS, AND HISTORY.

With INTRODUCTION by Professor A. B. BRUCE, D.D., Glasgow.

'A book fitted at once to meet the requirements of professional students of Scripture, and to serve as an available guide for educated laymen who, while using the Bible chiefly for edification, desire to have the advantage of the light which scholarship can throw on the sacred page, ought to meet with wide acceptance and to be in many ways useful. Such a book is the one now published. Dr. Briggs is exceptionally well qualified to prepare a work of this kind.'—Prof. Bruce.

'We are sure that no student will regret sending for this book.'—Academy.

'Dr. Briggs' book is a model of masterly condensation and conciseness. He knows how to be brief without becoming obscure.'—Freeman.

Commentary on the New Testament.

'Meyer has been long and well known to scholars as one of the very ablest of the German expositors of the New Testament. We are not sure whether we ought not to say that he is unrivalled as an interpreter of the grammatical and historical meaning of the sacred writers. The Publishers have now rendered another seasonable and important service to English students in producing this translation.'—Guardian.

The series, as written by Meyer himself, is completed by the publication of Ephesians with Philemon in one volume. But to this the Publishers have thought it right to add Thessalonians and Hebrews, by Dr. Lünemann, and the Pastoral and Catholic Epistles, by Dr. Huther. So few, however, of the Subscribers have expressed a desire to have Dr. Düsterdieck's Commentary on Revelation included, that it has been resolved in the meantime not to undertake it.

'I need hardly add that the last edition of the accurate, perspicuous, and learned commentary of Dr. Meyer has been most carefully consulted throughout; and I must again, as in the preface to the Galatians, avow my great obligations to the acumen and scholarship of the learned editor.'—BISHOP ELICOTT in Preface to his 'Commentary on Ephesians.'

'In accuracy of scholarship and freedom from prejudice, he is equalled by few.'—Literary Churchman.

'We have only to repeat that it remains, of its own kind, the very best Commentary of the New Testament which we possess.'—Church Bells.

'No exegetical work is on the whole more valuable, or stands in higher public esteem. As a critic he is candid and cautious; exact to minuteness in philology; a master of the grammatical and historical method of interpretation.'—Princeton Review.

REVELATION; ITS NATURE AND RECORD.

BY HEINRICH EWALD.

TRANSLATED BY REV. PROF. THOS. GOADBY, B.A.

CONTENTS.—Introductory: The Doctrine of the Word of God.—PART I. The Nature of the Revelation of the Word of God.—PART II. Revelation in Heathenism and in Israel.—PART III. Revelation in the Bible.

NOTE.—This first volume of Ewald's great and important work, 'Die Lehre der Bibel von Gott,' is offered to the English public as an attempt to read Revelation, Religion, and Scripture in the light of universal history and the common experience of man, and with constant reference to all the great religious systems of the world. The task is as bold and arduous as it is timely and necessary, and Ewald was well fitted to accomplish it. . . . The work has not simply a theological, but a high and significant apologetic value, which those who are called upon to deal with the various forms of modern scepticism will not be slow to recognise.—Extract from Translator's Preface.

'This volume is full of nervous force, eloquent style, and intense moral earnestness. There is poetry of feeling in it also; and, whilst it manifests an original mind, it is accompanied by that spirit of reverence which ought always to be brought to the study of the Holy Scripture. A masterly intellect is associated in Ewald with the humility of a child.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'Ewald is one of the most suggestive and helpful writers of this century. This is certainly a noble book, and will be appreciated not less than his other and larger works. . . . There is a rich poetic glow in his writing which gives to it a singular charm.'—Baptist Magazine.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF THEOLOGY.

BY J. F. RÄBIGER, D.D.,

Professor of Theology in the University of Breslau.

Translated from the German,

And Edited, with a Review of Apologetical Literature,

By REV. JOHN MACPHERSON, M.A.

'It is impossible to overrate the value of this volume in its breadth of learning, its wide survey, and its masterly power of analysis. It will be a "sine quâ non" to all students of the history of theology.'—Evangelical Magazine.

'Another most valuable addition to the library of the theological student. . . . It is characterized by ripe scholarship and thoughtful reflection. . . . It would result in rich gain to many churches if these volumes were placed by generous friends upon the shelves of their ministers.'—Christian World.

'One of the most important additions yet made to theological erudition.'—Nonconformist and Independent.

'Rabiger's Encyclopædia is a book deserving the attentive perusal of every divine. . . . It is at once instructive and suggestive.'—Athenaeum.

'A volume which must be added to every theological and philosophical library.'—British Quarterly Review.

HISTORY OF THE SACRED SCRIPTURES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FIFTH REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION.

CONTENTS.—Introduction. BOOK FIRST:—History of the Origin of the New Testament Writings—History of the Literature. BOOK SECOND:—History of the Collection of the New Testament Writings—History of the Canon. BOOK THIRD:—History of the Preservation of the New Testament Writings—History of the Text. BOOK FOURTH:—History of the Circulation of the New Testament Writings—History of the Versions. BOOK FIFTH:—History of the Theological Use of the New Testament Writings—History of Exegesis.

'It would be hard to name any single volume which contains so much that is helpful to the student of the New Testament. . . . Considering that so much ground is covered, the fulness and accuracy of the information given are remarkable. Professor Reuss's work is not that of a compiler, but of an original thinker, who throughout this encyclopedic volume depends much more on his own research than on the labours of his predecessors. . . . The translation is thoroughly well done, accurate, and full of life.'—Expositor.

'One of the most valuable volumes of Messrs. Clark's valuable publications. . . . Its usefulness is attested by undiminished vitality. . . . His method is admirable, and he unites German exhaustiveness with French lucidity and brilliancy of expression. . . . The sketch of the great exegetic epochs, their chief characteristics, and the critical estimates of the most eminent writers, is given by the author with a compression and a mastery that have never been surpassed.'—Archdeacon FARRAR.

'I think the work of Reuss exceedingly valuable.'—Professor C. A. BRIGGS, D.D.

'I know of no work on the same topic more scholarly and at the same time readable, and I regard the work as one of real value to scholars.'—President ALVAH HOVEY, Newton Theological Institute.

'A work of rare and long-tested merit. . . . I am sure that every theological teacher will be glad to be able to refer his students to it.'—Professor P. H. SEENSTRA, Cambridge, Mass.

‘A useful, valuable, and instructive commentary. The interpretation is set forth with clearness and cogency, and in a manner calculated to commend the volumes to the thoughtful reader. The book is beautifully got up, and reflects great credit on the publishers as well as the writers.’—The Bishop of Gloucester.

‘I have looked into this volume, and read several of the notes on crucial passages. They seem to me very well done, with great fairness, and with evident knowledge of the controversies concerning them. The illustrations are very good. I cannot doubt that the book will prove very valuable.’—The Bishop of Winchester.

‘We have already spoken of this commentary with warm praise, and we can certainly assert that the enterprise has now been brought to a close with really admirable work.’—English Churchman.

‘We congratulate Dr. Schaff on the completion of this useful work, which we are now able to commend, in its complete form, to English readers of the Scriptures. . . . It will be seen that we have a high opinion of this commentary, of the present volume, and also of the whole work. In this last respect it is perhaps of more uniform excellence than any of its rivals, and in beauty of appearance it excels them all.’—Church Bells.

‘External beauty and intrinsic worth combine in the work here completed. Good paper, good type, good illustrations, good binding, please the eye, as accuracy and thoroughness in matter of treatment satisfy the judgment. Everywhere the workmanship is careful, solid, harmonious.’—Methodist Recorder.

‘There are few better commentaries having a similar scope and object; indeed, within the same limits, we do not know of one so good upon the whole of the New Testament.’—Literary World.

‘We predict that this work will take its place among the most popular of the century. . . . The publishers have spared no pains to secure volumes that shall be worthy of the theme, and of the scholarship of the age.’—Freeman.

CHIEFLY OF THE Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries.

Being one of the 'Cunningham Lectures.'
BY JAMES WALKER, D.D., CARNWATH.

CONTENTS.—CHAP. I. Survey of the Field. II. Predestination and Providence. III. The Atonement. IV. The Doctrine of the Visible Church. V. The Headship of Christ and Erastianism. VI. Present Misrepresentation of Scottish Religion. VII. Do Presbyterians hold Apostolical Succession?

'These pages glow with fervent and eloquent rejoinder to the cheap scorn and scurrilous satire poured out upon evangelical theology as it has been developed north of the Tweed.'—British Quarterly Review.

'We do not wonder that in their delivery Dr. Walker's lectures excited great interest; we should have wondered far more if they had not done so.'—Mr. SPURGEON in Sword and Trowel.

'As an able and eloquent vindication of Scottish theology, the work is one of very great interest—an interest by no means necessarily confined to theologians. The history of Scotland, and the character of her people, cannot be understood without an intelligent and sympathetic study of her theology, and in this Dr. Walker's little book will be found to render unique assistance.'—Scotsman.
